Spare defense

Republicans back domestic cuts

WASHINGTON (AP) — Senate Republican leaders agreed yesterday to seek $3.6 billion in new cuts from domestic programs. The Senators decided to spare defense cuts in a bid to avoid a veto of legislation needed to keep the government from running out of money at midnight.

Without the additional spending cuts — an average of four percent in hundreds of programs — President Reagan "would undoubtedly veto" the huge emergency bill, said Senate Majority Leader Howard Baker.

Baker said a veto probably would force Congress into an around-the-clock weekend session to produce a second measure that Reagan would approve.

But with the cuts, Baker added, Reagan would put his signature on the measure needed to keep virtually the entire federal government solvent.

Baker predicted the Senate, later in the day, would vote its approval of the plan, which exempts the Pentagon, foreign aid and benefit programs such as food stamps and Medicare.

A final Senate vote on the $417.4 billion spending bill — still $2.3 billion more than Reagan wants — was expected last night or today. The bill would then return to the House, which earlier this week rejected a similar plan for new cuts.

Reagan is scheduled to leave Sunday for a weeklong Thanksgiving vacation in California, but White House spokesman David R. Gergen said yesterday that the president "would not leave Washington" if a satisfactory bill were not worked out.

Gergen, however, refused to tell reporters if Reagan considers Baker's $3.6 billion cut sufficient, even though in passing the emergency spending bill, the Senate Budget Committee sent an overall budget plan to the floor which virtually ignores changes in economic forecasts and deficit projections over the last six months.

The plan, which passed without recommendation, is practically a copy of a budget outline approved earlier this year. At the suggestion of Sen. Lawton Chiles, D-Fla., the panel estimated that without further action to cut spending or raise taxes, the deficit could reach $165 billion by 1984. This year's deficit will range from $76 billion to $92 billion.

Roos claims monetary expansion hurts U.S.

By GREG KOSSE

St. Louis Federal Reserve Bank President Lawrence K. Roos explained the complexities of the Federal Reserve System's stance on monetary supply reduction last night in the Center for Continuing Education.

Roos explained why the Fed is reducing the monetary supply and responded to industry's criticisms that the bank is stifling production. Roos was the third and last in a series of banking lectures sponsored by Notre Dame's Finance Club.

Before his chairmanship of the St. Louis Fed, Roos served as president of Mound City Trust Company in St. Louis and as chairman of the First Security Bank of Kirkwood, Mo. In 1975, he was elected executive vice president and a director of the First National Bank Bank in St. Louis. He was chosen Man of the Year in 1975 by the T St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Roos refuted the interest-sensitive segments of the economy's (housing and automobile industries) claims that their present plight is due to the slow growth of the money supply which raises interest rates.

He said a decrease in the money supply would stimulate the economy. Increasing the money supply would only bring a temporary relief, but eventually, interest rates would rise even higher and the economy would experience larger inflation.

To support his premise, Roos cited the economic trends of the past and how the Fed has reacted to pressure of interest-prone industry. When the Fed increased the money supply, the action "had a cumulative effect of causing the long-term trend rate of growth in money to rise from 1.5 percent in 1960 to approximately 7.5 percent now, and directly produced the inflation we are presently experiencing."

According to Roos, slower money growth does not promote higher interest rates. During the period from 1954 to 1966, the money growth rate was 2.5 percent and interest rates were about 3.5 percent. "Since 1966, annual money growth increased to about 6.5 percent and interest rates have risen to an average of 7.5 percent. The increase in the average growth rate of money since 1966 is directly reflected in higher interest rates."

Barton discusses arms control

By ED KONRADY
News Staff

Strategic arms control is more important now than ever before because of the major concern with nuclear weapons, according to Professor John J. Barton, a professor of law at Stanford University.

Barton spoke yesterday afternoon to a small crowd at 124 Hayes-Healy. His speech, "Enjoying Arms Control on a SALT (Strategic Arms Limitation Treaty) Free Diet," dealt with problem of the symmetrical arms balance necessary to work out another arms limitation treaty.

"Americans have a tendency to focus on the worst possible thing that could happen. The arms control community tends to focus on nuclear and strategic weapons. The military community tends to focus on the idea of an attack from the Soviet community," he said, calling this phenomenon the "Pearl Harbor mentality."

Society tends to worry about nuclear weapons when making SALT and other arms limitation treaties, Barton said, and ignores the negotiations concerning conventional weapons.

"There are a number of reasons why conventional weapon negotiations are important. First, this is where the deaths are. Since World War II, many more people have been killed by conventional weapons than the nuclear bomb.

"Risks of war have increased with an increase in conventional weapons; however, with nuclear weapons, the fear of mutual destruction lowers the risks of war. Some people would even say that because of nuclear weapons, the US and USSR are farther from war than ever.

"Thirdly, the economic costs of war is mostly in conventional weapons. In the United States, $14 billion is spent on strategic weapons while $65 billion is spent on conventional weapons. Only one fifth of the $500 billion spent for world defense is for strategic weapons."

Instead of trying to trim the budget for nuclear weapons so there is more money for other projects, Barton suggests that we try to reduce the budget for conventional weapons.

New alliances are needed to reduce the defense budget. The anti-nuclear group, according to Barton, is not strong enough to get the votes necessary. A group of people who want to reduce the defense budget, control arms or increase productivity, could band together to get enough votes to affect the amount of money spent for defense.

One place the government could cut the conventional weapons budget is in arms exports. "Our current arms export policy is in a big mess. Arms have become a 'currency,' a 'gift' to other leaders when we visit or act as a host. Today's currency is the F-16. The idea of vetoing arms exports doesn't work. Everytime the president goes to Congress, he is going to win. Only when the arms are going to countries that can hurt Greece and Israel, two countries with a lot of power in Congress, is there any opposition."

Even with limits in arms exports, a decrease in the defense budgets and a strategic limitation treaty of some kind, arms control still faces the problem that no effective police action will ever be effective against the United States and the USSR.

Now mandatory

Laundry service under review

Notre Dame Student Senator Brian Callaghan has begun a project that could possibly persuade the University to abolish the mandatory laundry fees for male students.

Presently, the University charges each male student about $75 per year for the laundry service regardless of amount of use.

A Student Senate survey taken last October predicted that about 32 percent of the men would choose to wash their own clothes. Another 38 percent would use coin-operated washers and driers occasionally. Twenty-eight percent said they would use the laundry service exclusively.

Vice President for Business Affairs Thomas Mason, who would have to approve an optional laundry, says he does not object to this program in theory. Mason added that no one has been able to locate space for new washing machines.

"I don't have any disagreement with the voluntary use of the laundry," Mason said. "But let's see where we can put the machines. That's the main stumbling block."

Mason is also unsure if a large enough percentage of men would start washing their own clothes to warrant the cost of the new machines.

Callaghan said he has found space for machines in all the men's dorms except in Grace and Flanner. Callaghan will see if maintenance can install machines in the spaces. Callaghan expects a Senate proposal by Christmas.

Laundry Director Norm Muller said he could implement any plan of the University after solving initial logistical problems.

"It's not a matter of whether I want (the optional laundry) or not," he said. "It's up to the University and students to work it out, but I can implement it."

Mason and Muller met with Student Body President Don Murday and Callaghan over a month ago to discuss the proposal. As a result, the problem of finding the needed space for the machines is now in the "student's court," Mason replied.

While Murday remains "optimistic," Mason thinks the proposal is "left in a quandry" because of the space problem.

Mason thinks the halls are already cramped for space without laundry machines. "In my mind, the study and social space is more important than laundry space," Mason said, adding that few rectors would consider the idea very "nifty."

Murday thinks the dorms with ample social space will make room for the washing machines.

Murday added that if the proposal is accepted, maintenance will install washers and driers on a trial basis next semester to judge the student's response.

When Soviet President Leonid I. Brezhnev arrives Sunday in Bonn, West Germany, on a four-day visit, the West Germans will urge him to accept President Reagan's call for reduction of nuclear missiles in Europe. Chancellor Helmut Schmidt said he will use the visit — Brezhnev's first to the West since he and former President Carter signed the SALT II accords — to press the Kremlin leader to go along with Reagan's offer to end the deployment of U.S. missiles in return for the dismantling of Soviet rockets aimed at Western Europe. West Germans hope Brezhnev's visit will give them a firsthand view of Kremlin reaction to the plan, made by Reagan on Wednesday. — AP

It takes female doctors twice as long as men to be promoted in some medical colleges, and the percentage of women on medical faculties is smaller than it was in 1965, a new study says. The study of four medical colleges shows that female physicians are promoted more slowly at all academic levels, but the researchers say the reasons for this are unclear. The results of the study appear in the Journal of American Medicine, published today. Dr. Lila Wallis, one of the study's authors, said her research showed that while the number of women in medical schools has increased almost threefold over 15 years — to about 30 percent — women account for only about 10 percent of all medical faculty. — AP

A majority of Americans who are familiar with David Stockman's controversial statements about President Reagan's economic program think Stockman should keep his job as budget director, according to the latest Associated Press-NBC News poll. The poll also said Stockman's recently reported comments casting doubt on Reagan's economic program have not changed most people's minds about the program's chances of success. A scientific random sampling contacted 1,602 adults nationwide. Participants were telephoned Monday and Tuesday. Forty-five percent said Stockman's comments made no difference in the way they feel about Reagan's economic program, while 22 percent said the comments made them less optimistic about the program's success. Two percent said they were not sure, and 31 percent said they did not hear or read about Stockman's comments. Reagan rejected Stockman's offer to resign last week after Atlantic Monthly published an article based on a series of interviews with Stockman over a 10-month period. — AP

Actor Robert De Niro will play Josip Broz Tito in a movie about the life of the late Yugoslav leader, a Belgrade weekly reported yesterday. The film, to be produced by Brad Dexter, an American of Yugoslav origin, will be based on a book about Tito written by Sir Fitzroy McLean, according to the weekly, Novosti. McLean was the chief of the British mission to partisan headquarters of Marshal Tito during World War II and was Tito's personal friend. McLean told the magazine the plot of the would run from Tito's childhood in his native village of Kumrovec till 1960. The name of the screenwriter is being kept secret, the magazine said. — AP

The economy grew this summer despite early reports of economic decline, the government said yesterday. Nonetheless, economists said they are certain the nation is in a recession. Revising preliminary figures that had indicated a downturn, the Commerce Department said in a new report that inflation-adjusted gross national product rose at an annual rate of 0.6 percent in the July-September quarter. The Department of Commerce's preliminary report last month said "real" GNP — the value of all the goods and services the nation produces — had dropped at an annual rate of 0.6 percent in the third quarter after declining at a rate of 1.6 percent in the spring quarter. The transformation of a decline into a gain was due almost entirely to a buildup in inventories, a clearly recessionary trend indicating that manufacturers were having trouble selling their goods. — AP

Justice Department attorneys believe that despite "a lot of smoke," President Reagan's national security adviser, Richard V. Allen, did not act unlawfully when he accepted $1,000 after helping Japanese journalists obtain an interview with Mrs. Reagan, sources said yesterday. The department sources, who asked not to be named, said a preliminary investigation by the public integrity section has produced no evidence so far to warrant naming a special prosecutor; however, the sources added, the investigation and review of the evidence has not been completed. They said it would be "premature" to comment on whether a prosecutor would be appointed. It was expected that the department would make some official statement about the case before the day was out, but probably would not announce any conclusions. — AP

Student center: fantasy to fact

Jim McDonnell was in an exceptionally good mood. In fact, the director of student activities was having a hard time keeping his excitement to himself. Almost as soon as I walked into the Student Activities Office Wednesday, the reason for his glee jumped to the forefront of our conversation: progress on a new student center for Notre Dame.

"Things are happening now that haven't happened in years around here," beamed McDonnell. "I think that we've reached the first step toward a new student center — the University is now philosophically behind the idea."

Many ND students as well as some faculty members and other observers have become so complacent and cynical about the proposal for the student center that the conversation I've described above probably doesn't mean too much. We've been hearing a lot of talk — and very little progress or even apparent concern — for years now. In fact there has been a lot of frustration on campus lately following the revelation that a structure housing laboratory animals might displace the student center as the next construction project on the University's agenda following the faculty office building.

So why the cause for McDonnell's ear-to-ear grin now?

"For the first time, Fr. Hesburgh has said that he is really behind the idea," McDonnell revealed. Certainly this is a milestone. Hesburgh's full dedication to the student center concept is one of the keystones to the eventual construction of the facility. Before we get too optimistic, however, we must realize that even though Hesburgh has reportedly jumped on the bandwagon, there are many obstacles remaining. Three major concerns include a study to determine precisely what facilities should be included in the center, the search for a multi-millionaire donor and, perhaps most importantly, the selection of a site for the structure.

McDonnell admitted to be in doubt about the site problem. At this point most observers can only speculate on possible sites for any potential center. The site of the old fieldhouse (following its demolition), a strip of land along St. Joseph's Lake, a portion of Green Field and a location midway along Saint Mary's Road have all been mentioned in the past as possible construction sites. During my discussion with McDonnell, he raised a new possibility: a site adjacent to the Morris Inn and directly across the road from Dillon Hall on the current site of one of the Burke Memorial Golf Course greens. At this point, however, such a suggestion is only one more to be added to the long list, and speculation will no doubt continue.

Still, McDonnell's air of excitement is hard to shrug off. What has caused the cogs of the University to start moving on this long-festering problem?

"Students are basically powerless," explained McDonnell. "But this time, they have finally collected the kind of coalition necessary to get things done around here. The Board of Trustees, the PACE Committee, and the Alumni Board are all behind the concept now.

"Don Murday was so impressive in his presentations to the trustees and other groups that they have finally become seriously aware of the needs of students and in particular the need for a student center," McDonnell recalled. "I myself haven't seen a more impressive presentation from a student during the time I've been here."

"No one can argue that Murday has not tried his best to promote the student center concept. For three years now, he has hammered away at the trustees and other influential groups. I was present at the Alumni Board's fall meeting and witnessed his presentation to that group, and I can report that there were more than a few impressed — and aroused — alumni faces looking back from over the conference tables after Murday made his points. Many were particularly indignant when told about the precedence of the laboratory animal shelter over the student center and about the side-effects of a lack of social space on campus.

If we are indeed closer to the day of groundbreaking for the center, as Jim McDonnell believes, then much of the credit should go to Murday, his staff and his predecessors in the role of student body president; however it is much too early to be handing out laurels. The excitement this week has yet to be substantiated in terms of public statements or dollars and cents. There is undoubtedly a long road ahead for the student center concept and a requisite need for continuing pressure and diligence on behalf of our elected student leaders. But still, it was particularly satisfying, during an otherwise boring and overcast week, to hear of a little ray of sunshine on this matter.

Preventative measures

Forum addresses alcohol issue

By SUSAN FLECK
News Staff

An Open Forum on the topic of alcohol at Notre Dame was attended by about 30 people last Wednesday night in the Flanner Commons.

Members of the panel include David Link, Dean of the Law School and member of the PACE committee on Student Life; Psychological Services Counselor Peggy Cronin; Flanner Hall President Lloyd Burke; Keenan Hall President Paul Callahan; Lt. Cmdr. Richard Horstmann; and Professor Walter Davis.

Dean Link's study on alcohol use at ND is "charged with a suggested program on what to do with alcohol on campus." Link described two points of his planning; a quick-response, "fire fighting plan," and a more intense, "fire prevention plan." He said that these preventative measures must come from a revised attitude on campus.

The point of this forum as indicated by the Dean was not the usual debate of "whether or not our problem is greater or less than other universities", but rather what to do since "the problem exists."

Horstmann, a Notre Dame NROTC instructor, related the similarities between Navy life and "A large percentage of problem drinkers come from very repressive or very liberal backgrounds."

ND life, noting that neither group has had any formal education on alcohol and that those with problems run the gamut of the age group — not only students, but older faculty members as well. He said that it is necessary to promote responsible attitudes and to identify and help people in order to reduce the problem of alcoholism.

Along the same lines, Davis declared "students, faculty, and staff are all in this together." He stated that counseling is the answer to drinking, not discipline. Recognition of the problem and treating it are more important than punishing actions that result from excessive drinking, according to Davis.

On the HPC Alcohol Policy, Flanner Hall President Lloyd Burke emphasized that Notre Dame has a drinking problem which must be confronted on a dorm and individual level. Party rooms are for socializing, not for drinking and getting drunk, according to the HPC statement.

Also, dorms are encouraged to implement rules restricting the percentage of funds allocated to alcoholic beverages. The HPC calls for a re-evaluation of the priority of alcohol at social functions and the formation of alcohol commissions in each dorm in order to sponsor greater awareness.

In conclusion Link said "drinking is one of the most serious student life problems at ND." He also stated that a large percentage of problem drinkers come from very repressive or very liberal backgrounds. The family of Notre Dame has to deal with the problem through community efforts and a statement released by the Administration recognizing the problem, according to Link.

During the question and answer period a variety of suggestions and questions were brought up. One student believed that examples of alumni are followed by students — therefore ridding the campus of beer tents during alumni functions could provide a shock value to make the alumni realize that everyone has to participate in the effort. Social space was also another option considered in coping with the drinking problem. Whatever the decision, according to Link, "what I'd like to have by spring is a University statement and some policies."

Roos concluded that "the only way to bring interest rates down and keep them down is to adopt, advertise and adhere to a policy to gradually reduce the growth rate in money."

Roos, given a plaque, mug, book, shirt and Senior Bar Card, commented, "I'll come back next week."

Embarking on the Urban 'Pillage'

Many Notre Dame students will partake in what is known as an "Urban Plunge," that is, they will spend time in a urban area of a big city and find out what kind of life other people lead. Over the mid-semester break, I went home to Houston and took part in my own little urban plunge.

By Gus Tamborello

Houston is a city of phenomenal growth. Over a thousand move there each week, many of whom are Eastern businessmen. The problem is, crime grows where the money goes, so to speak. One out of every four Houstonians is a victim of a felony each year. My urban plunge allowed me to become a member of this statistic.

For the first few days, I visited one of the worst slums in the area called Fifth Ward, or "The Bloody Fifth" to those who live there. This is an area where rats run around like dogs, and hoboes and street-corner men are as prevalent as stop signs. The area houses people who live below the poverty level. Many want to work, but local businesses are run out by the terrible crime rate.

The ironic thing of it all was that no one bothered me as I went through this area. My trouble began when I went to the bus station on the outskirts of downtown Houston a couple of miles away.

I wanted to go to Austin to visit a friend at the University of Texas and I had to catch the bus at the downtown terminal. I didn't really mind that because I thought I could get into the "urban life" even further. I wanted to find out, too, if what people say about bus stations is really true. Well, I found out.

I had my sister drive me to the bus station. We were really happy because we found a parking meter right in front. The problem was, my sister brought her two children with her, so we looked like we were about to take a family trip to grandmother's house.

We walked in very quickly, because vagrants lined the walls of the station and we didn't want to take any chances. Plus, two days earlier, my grandmother and aunt were walking to the bus stop a few blocks down and a young boy came up to my grandmother, grabbed her gold necklace off of her neck and ran. Upon calling the police, she was told that they just could not cover every area of town. So be it.

We went straight to the ticket counter as we got in the door. I was amazed to see how really run down the place was. There was not even a security guard. But, we were in safe, so we didn't worry too much about it.

I went up to the counter to buy my ticket and in walks one of the hoboes I had seen outside. He was heading straight for me, so I stopped talking to the ticket lady. The man had a green army jacket and was barefooted. He said, "Hey, how ya doin'?"

I said, "Fine," and was fairly nervous as to what his next move might be. I thought for sure that he was going to ask me for money.

Well, he didn't ask. I had the money for the bus ticket in my hand and, trying to ignore the man, placed ten dollars of it on the counter. Suddenly the man grapped the money and stormed out of the door. Two other men in the bus station ran after him.

I stood there as if I had just lost my American Express traveller's checks. I was hoping Karl Malden would walk in the door, but then again, he would have reprimanded me for carrying cash.

The ticket lady was in shock. She said that this had never happened before. That really didn't concern me at this point. I was more furious about the lack of security than about the ten lost bucks.

A few minutes later, though, the two men dragged in the vagrant that ripped me off. The bus people took him in the back. The bus was leaving at 11:15, and it was now 11:00. The bus people called the police, and miraculously, they made it there in about 10 minutes.

The questioned the guy and he claimed to be Jesus Christ. His first words were, "Swear to God, I'm Jesus Christ." But Mr. Christ did not have my ten bucks. He said he dropped it when the two men chased him. The police searched him, and sure enough he didn't have my money. The police asked me what happened and I told them that I was putting money on the counter and the guy took it.

"Whose money was it?" he asked. "What a stupid question, I thought. "Mine," I said.

"Do you want to press charges?" he followed.

"Well," I answered, "does that mean I'll have to appear in court?" "Yeah, in about 30 days."

I couldn't press charges because I'd be in school and I wasn't going to come home from a thousand miles away to put a man in jail for stealing ten dollars. So I asked if my sister could press charges. He answered no. He said that since it was my money, I had to press charges. So, I told him that my sister gave me the money before we got to the bus station. Of course, he didn't believe me and answered, "That would be against this man's Constitutional right. And I'm not going to go against our Constitution."

Then he said, "Well, maybe we can book him on abusive language."

I had to laugh. Here he wouldn't let me lie about the money, but he felt he had the duty to make up an offense. Meanwhile, the bus driver was flooring his accelerator pedal, hinting that the bus was waiting for me. I decided that I wouldn't ruin my trip, so I left and told him to do what he wanted.

Later, my sister called the bus station. They told her that they released him immediately.

The purpose of all of this is not to discourage anyone from going on an Urban Plunge. I think the lesson learned was extremely worthwhile. Just remember, though, go in with an open mind, and a closed pocket-book.

I become obsessed with the most insignificant things sometimes. Out of all the tragedies encountered while paging through today's big city daily — murder, poverty, cancer, Dear Abby — this item drew my focus: George Burns' EARLY, EARLY, EARLY Christmas Special. It's never too early for George Burns, so start the yuletide swinging with George and

Paul Kosidowski

Second Thoughts

his special guests: Bob Hope, The Playboy Playmates, Hans Conried, The Hawkins Family, Raw Satin and Special Guest Star Ann-Margret.

What more could Santa ask for? As eager as I am to get my yuletide "swinging," I unfortunately missed George and Bob and their Holiday antics last Monday night. Oh, I don't have anything against the Playmates or Ann-Margret (with apologies to Groucho) becoming a part of my Christmas celebration. I just figured that there would be many opportunities to watch something along the same lines in the near future.

I don't really mind the Early, Early, Early bit. The smidgens of tinsel and evergreen that are already showing up around the windows and doors of America instill an anachronistic shock, but they are welcome. After all, with the World Series over what else is there?

Most of the commercialism doesn't really bother me. I was once an activist in the NEO-over the river and through the woods school of Christmas nostalgia, but now I have come to accept things like prewrapped presents, plastic trees and even Ronald McDonald in a red suit and beard. Besides, if there is one thing worse than Christmas commercialism, it's columnists complaining about Christmas commercialism.

I can't really say what upset me about the threat of this seemingly harmless hour of television. I am not an anti-video radical. I had no part in the picture tube burnings of the '60s. But I am uneasy about the oil-and-water juxtaposition of the modernity of television and the tradition of Christmas.

Christmas seems to be one of the few things still firmly rooted in tradition, and therefore isolated from change. But traditions change too; they are born, they grow and they die.

Television has become an important tradition. The smell of sugar cookies and nut bread that once drew us to grandma's house may have already been replaced by the sound of Burl Ives telling of "Rudolf the Red-Nosed Reindeer" or the prospect of watching "White Christmas" on Betamax. The networks have the marketing technique down: "A heartwarming tale for the whole family."

Don't mistake me. I love the Grinch; Linus's reading from the Gospel of Luke is one of my favorite moments in television. But there are just too many of them. Christmas "variety" shows have lost their variety and the "specials" have been smothered in an avalanche of celebrity family carolers and still more versions of Dickens' A Christmas Carol adapted for "modern audiences."

The Christmas dramas are usually well done. Many convey the spirit well and some are very touching. They present real people who get something very meaningful out of the Christmas experience. They are emotionally packed, involve supreme sacrifices. We are supposed to react accordingly.

In a disconcerting way, these dramas present a challenge to us. "Are your Christmas's like this?" they ask. After being saturated with their sentimentality, we wonder if our holidays are as charming or as eventful. In fact, we get so emotional watching them that our sensitivity stays in the den with the television. We are so moved by what happened on Walton mountain that, by comparison, the "Christmas" happening in the next room becomes trivial.

I am convinced that beyond all the hype and fakery there is a solid foundation of "true spirit." It can be felt in those moments that are special because they are so rare. To fictionalize those moments, put them on a screen and pump them into our homes is to rob us of the quiet glory of that spirit.

I know that drama created by the world's greatest artists could never hold a candle to some of the moments from my past years. No author could have touched me like my mom did when she "gave" me the first letter I had written from school. My sister's version of "Silent Night" beats Andy Williams' by a mile. My dad can tell a joke better than George Burns ever could.

Thank God for that.

The chocolate soldier

They sat at a table near the window, watching the lights on the water. Neither of them would ever be young again. They were afraid of being overtaken by midnight, when their evening would end. Conscience, they were saying, made cowards of them both.

"There's no sense in pretending," he said, "that wouldn't be comforting. But when it was over, we could be destroyed by regret."

"I would remember," she said, "that it had happened once. That would always be comforting to me."

He placed his hand over hers. "Please," he said, I would be afraid of the morning."

"I know," she said. "I would never want anything that I thought would hurt you."

"Anyway," he said, "the problem is: nothing ever happens only once."

They sat there wordlessly, in love with the sweetness of the other's presence. The evening was reaching its climax in this silent affection. The high excitement that had come with early drinks was beginning to fade like a flower that has lost touch with the morning.

"One should either love foolishly," he said, or not love at all. Hell is pretending virtue that you don't really mean, because you are afraid."

Somewhere from a piano bar, a girl was singing Cole Porter.

*What is this thing called love?
This funny thing called love?
Just who can solve its mystery?
Why should it make a fool of me?
I saw you there one wonderful day.
You took my heart and threw it away.
That's why I ask the Lord in Heaven above,
What is this thing called love?*

"Whatever love is," he said, "I do think I love you."
"You're devoted," she said, "like a chocolate soldier."
"What does that mean?" he said. "That I'm not Marlon Brando?"

"I don't know what it means," she said. "I thought it sounded pretty."

"I know I don't have a lot of courage," he said. "It makes me feel bloodless. I sometimes feel I'm not very real. Is that why you call me a chocolate soldier?"

"You're the sweetness of candy that will melt in the rain," she said teasingly. "I'm the marzipan lady from the Christmas ballet. Nothing is hard for us because it's all so pretty."

"Our evenings always end like this," he said, "in an expensive restaurant, listening to love songs on a piano. When I'm an old man, waiting to die, some nun in a nursing home will want to sing me a song to fall asleep by. I'll ask for a bitter sweet tune about the mystery called love, and she will think I'm crazy."

"You can tell her that you were a chocolate soldier," she said, who was loved by a lady as pure as sugar."

"I'll tell her we were eaten by mice," he said. It certainly feels that way."

"The drinks are wearing off, the candles are burning down, and you're feeling sorry for yourself," she said. "Tomorrow, we will still have love, and we won't have to make apologies to anyone, even ourselves."

"With our innocence intact for the Christmas ballet," he said. "One lives dangerously as a chocolate soldier."

At eleven o'clock, they left the restaurant, having finally decided to find a motel. The car they were driving belonged to her aunt.

"Dear old witch," she said affectionately, speaking of her aunt. "She's my godmother, you know, and she expects me home by twelve."

"We'll have to call her," he said, "Why do you call her a witch?"

"Because she's old, and knows everything," she said. "I've never been able to lie to her." She suddenly shivered.

"What's the matter?" he asked.

"I felt funny," she said, "as though there were mice running down my back."

Getting out of the car at the motel, he kissed her.

"Your hair," he said, "in the moonlight, looks as though it has turned to glass."

"I never noticed before," she said, "how much you look like Marlon Brando."

"Holding you," he said dreamily, "I feel as though I am touching the purest crystal."

"Oh my God," she said, "your lips taste like fudge... as tough you really were... a chocolate soldier."

The both turned to look at the old yellow car, as though suddenly realizing it could turn into a pumpkin. Witches who are godmothers grow mischievous at midnight, like the consciences that make cowards of us all.

"What Glue Can Do," an exhibition of assemblage by Don Vogt, opens Sunday, Nov. 22 at the Snite Museum of Art. There will be an open reception from 2 to 4 p.m.

Midwest offers less than pleasant thoughts

What's the matter with the Midwest? It seems that everyone not from it, and some of those who are, can't stand the place. Different people give different reasons for loathing it:

1) There is no ocean out here. Whoever heard of going to the beach of a polluted lake? There's probably more surf in a bathtub. There's no shark attacks either. What is going to liven up those long, sweaty afternoons, lolling in the sand, without an occasional clearing of the water, and maybe even a sighting? The worst that can happen in a lake is you might be gummed by a confused coho.

2) There are no big cities. Besides Chicago, the Midwest is nothing more than farms, small towns, and more farms. Feeble attempts at citydom, like South Bend, are laughable at best. Even Chicago is sort of a half-hearted. Who ever heard of a skyline consisting of three buildings?

3) the sports teams out here are terrible. One only has to mention such names as the Cubs, Bears, Wilcats, to evoke thundering yawns of enthusiasm from fans. You know they are bad when you see the high schools getting equal coverage in the local sports page.

4) the newspapers out here read like high school journalism class projects. The Chicago Trib is the only major city newspaper I've seen that routinely runs Boy eats own foot stories on the front page. It's only redeeming quality is the comics page. The South Bend Trib (what's with all this 'trib' stuff? Can't they think of anything else to call them?) is even worse. God forbid some dog doesn't get lost or some kindergardener say something cute or they'd be out of front page stories. A big scoop is when the guy who writes the business page finds out about the big sale at Kroger's before the Home-life people.

Let's face it, the Midwest is boring with a capital B. You know it's hurting when people start looking forward to tornadoes. The Wizard of Oz was the great- est thing to ever happen to the Midwest. You don't know how many people each year throw themselves into tornadoes to try to escape.

Even the commercials on TV are boring. I've learned more than enough about how to kill pesky root worms in my corn fields. I'm curious to know if water beds are now the main industry in South Bend. Every third ad on the radio is for somebody selling waterbeds. And the names of these stores, what creativity! Waterbeds, waterbeds, waterbeds? Lifestyle waterbeds? (Does the new lifestyle come with it?) Most of the ad writing must be done by a co-op program with the South Bend grade schools. No rational adult could be responsible for those.

It's funny when a native Midwesterner gets defensive about their turf.

Listen buddy, where do you think tha bread you're eating comes from?

Cows and wheat. Is that all the Midwest is good for?

Chicago is one of the biggest cities in the country.

Big deal. Compared to most cities out East, Chi-town ain't beans. New York's ghettos are ten times bigger and more dangerous than Chicago's. In a rumble, Chicago's street gangs would get their butts kicked by New York's hoods. New York has more trash, more pollution, probably more rats, they even have their own filthy waterway. Chicago does have Gary, though. Nothing beats Gary.

The Trib loves to trumpet Jane Byrne's least political screwup, and all other government corruption for that matter, on its front page. You want corruption? Come to Washington. That stuff about kickbacks, bribes, cardinals keeping mistresses; that stuff doesn't even rate third page coverage in the Post. There's so much greed, lying, and general evil in D.C., no one cares anymore. When it comes to political immorality, Washington makes Chicago look like a weekly bridge club meeting.

The poor Midwest. Everyone dumps on it all the time. I guess someone has to be from it, but I'm glad it's not me.

Dance portrays expressions

Human existence operates on the experiential level. Each unit of time, space and energy coagulates into a moment that continuously varies. Patterns form, leaving impressions and memories of the solitary event just experienced. Life consists of a continuum of such moments, spontaneous generation of one moment to the next. Abiogenesis.

Art forms endeavor to capture these moments, piece them together and release a glimpse of how human existence is perceived. An eager audience views such forms with a hungry mind, ready to partake of the moments. Hopefully these experiences generate a reevaluation of old fixed views of life. Abiogenesis. This past Wednesday evening, Abiogenesis Dance Collective prof-fered a window through which on-lookers could glimpse the evolving realities around them. A World War Three holocaust, the activities of pedestrian traffic and the mechanical workings of an office were some of the themes of their works. The Collective utilized movement studies and mime rather than classical dance forms to express these themes.

Classified as an experimental school of dance, their studies obviously evolved from the classical forms but were not restricted by their structures. They flew as high and wide as the individual dancer's imagination. The units of space, time and energy of each dancer originated from within and concentrated itself in the context of the dances.

Of the ten pieces, "4 Women was problematic. It strived to be a classical piece juxtaposing suspension and collapse but sadly failed. The choreography lacked the necessary fluidity of classical ballet in which this piece was rooted.

Each of the remaining nine pieces succeeded to varying degrees to express in the experiential and experimental mode particular aspects of life. Some were familiar to all like "Office Procedures" which highlighted office equipment or "Pillow Talk" which relied on the innocent seductiveness of the 'smooth' pillow to give it the classic 'boy meets girl' look.

"Toccata" and "City" put into movement the inner tensions and paradoxes of the world in which we live. The former gave a view of what life will be after a nuclear holocaust; the latter blatantly displayed the tension between non-communication and the inner desire to reach out to others.

These various units of energy, time and space succeeded in drawing the audience into the experience of life as perceived through dance. Art sincerely imitated life. Hopefully now, abiogenesis will expand that life.

Baby boom faces job squeeze

On a recent Sunday evening, five friends in their mid-20s gathered around a kitchen table to eat dinner and watch "60 Minutes."

They were some of the brightest graduates of this state's public university system. Since college, however, each friend had been forced to abandon his or her career plan and take what jobs were available. It had been a matter of survival.

Howard, an English major, gave up pursuing a master's degree to work in a bookstore.

Tammy, a would-be commercial designer, is helping remodel a downtown department store.

John, who has a bachelor's degree in music, had to settle for coaching young clarinetists one night per week.

Mary, John's wife, now drives a school bus part-time and waits for political campaign work.

After years of school and tuition loan repayments, these young Americans know that the economy has been hard on them. None needed to be told by Ronald Reagan that the country was in a "bit of a recession." They've done their best to find work near their fields, or change vocations entirely.

Yet a bigger test of their flexibility lies ahead. Children on the baby-boom generation are in for what the Wall Street Journal calls a crunch in white-collar "middle-management" jobs.

According to the Journal, the next 10 years will see dark days for American between 18 and 35. The job promotions and salary increases they're expecting won't be as plentiful as everyone would like.

It's mathematical: Though the population of Americans who would normally compete for management-related jobs will rise over 40 percent by 1990, the number of job openings will only swell about 20 percent during that period. Our friends should be prepared to handle the crunch, but few are expecting it.

In popular terms, millions of baby-boomers won't reach the upper rungs on the "ladder of success" that they always assumed were within their grasp. It's not uncommon today to find 35-year-old supervisors who, bored with their work, face another 10 years before a decent promotion comes through.

Compensating for the loss of routine advancement won't be a snap for our friends. After all, our nation has worshipped promotions and high salaries for generations. Where do you go and what do you do if you can't "get ahead"?

"Our traditional notions of success will have to change from both the point of view of the employer and employee," said Kenneth Brousseau, a University of Southern California business professor and career development researcher. "It won't happen overnight. Horatio Alger is still very strong in people's minds."

Brousseau told our reporter Michael Duffy that baby-boomers best not underestimate the odds against them. "For the majority, it would be a mistake to assume that I'll be one of the favored few," he adds. "Everyone between 18 and 35 is going to face unprecedented competition and will have to decide if they want to deal with it."

Soon, younger Americans will begin to notice that their older brothers and sisters in white-collar jobs aren't going anywhere. And they'll eventually seek new ways to avoid the unrewarding rat race.

Rather than moving up what Disraeli called the "greasy pole of success," business professors advise trying new occupations every five or 10 years.

Sacrificing a traditional career may seem like a dead-end proposition, but might be more rewarding in the long run. New skills and knowledge are arguably better for personal growth than yearning for status, prestige and authority.

Indeed, surveys of today's business students show that experience in a variety of jobs can be preferable to salary hikes and pressure-filled job responsibilities. And ironically, recent surveys of chief executives also shows that, once they make it, top managers attach little value to the trappings of their position.

Such reports indicate the nation may already be altering its notion of a successful career. And that's good news to us.

Of course, not everyone will adapt to the times. Many will instead take a more pessimistic approach and do anything to get ahead in the coming crunch.

Like it or not, our flexible contemporaries will have to become the survivalists of the 1980s. We're counting on them to be creative trailblazers.

Frese question continues as professor backs University

Dear Editor:

Professor Rodes is no doubt correct in pointing out in his recent letter to the Observer that the legal firm representing the University in the Frese case did not get its high reputation by advising clients to settle cases that can be won, but his inference from that premise (that the Frese case therefore had merit) is an injudicious non-sequitur. His inference might be valid if the Frese case was to be adjudicated on its individual merits rather than as part of a class action. But it was not an individual suit.

Ms. Frese (who no one ever accused of being a fool) did not make the mistake of suing on the merits of her individual case (which she could not have won since her record was far from the "exemplary" one she has misled so many into believing). As soon as the case became a class action suit, the issue became not whether Ms. Frese merited promotion on the basis of her academic record; it became whether she or any one of the other 67 women who joined her suit had been discriminated against on the basis of sex for promotion, pay, class assignments, etc. Moreover, successful defense of the case depended on Notre Dame's ability to prove it had not discriminated, not only against the 68 women, but against any woman in the entire University going back to a time before we had coeds or women professors here, i.e. to a time when our sexual attitudes were closer to St. Jerome's than to those of the women's liberation movement. Since the burden of proof was on the University to prove its innocence of all sexual discrimination (difficult to do in any circumstance, impossible in the context just described), and not on the plaintiffs to prove they merited promotion or pay, the University's highly reputable law firm advised the University to settle out of court, to save itself time, money, and a good deal of public testimony perhaps embarrassing to many. The advice and the acceptance of that advice were based purely on expedience (which Professor Duffy rightly condemns because he believes a University should uphold its ideals).

But acceptance of the expedient course does not mean that Ms. Frese won her case on the basis of her record. The merits of her record have never been judged legally. They have, however, been judged professionally—four times by four differently composed promotions committees of the English Department, four times by two different English Dept. Chairmen, four times by the Dean of Arts and Letters, four times by two different provosts, four times by four deans' committees, once by a specially appointed University committee, and four times by the President of the University. In each individual judgment, Ms. Frese's record was found not worthy of promotion. Given this record of twenty-one separate judgments by diverse University officials, Prof. Rodes must believe a conspiracy was afoot to assert (gratuitously) that "those processes would not stand up under scrutiny."

If Frese's suit had been an individual suit, the University could, and undoubtedly would, have fought it as a matter of principle and won it. As a class action, it was too much to handle. And so it took the expedient advice of its reputable lawyers, to treat Dolores Frese as an aberration.

The final irony in all this is that though Ms. Frese involved 67 other women in her class action suit to get what she wanted, none of them will get what they wanted, now that their suit has been efficiently terminated by the action of Ms. Frese's lawyers.

Sincerely,
Robert J. Lordi,

Iranian student objects to portrayal in 'Simon' cartoon

This letter concerns the cartoon strip "Simon" which appeared in The Observer on Tuesday, November 3. This cartoon was about an Iranian student with the '60s hippie look talking to his advisor. He was complaining that Emil Hofman would not allow him to leave his chemistry quiz saying there was no room for politics in chemistry.

I am sure that Jeb Cashin was not making a personal attack on Dr. Hofman. Emil is very sensitive to the problems of students, especially foreign students. He has made an effort to know us and to make us feel at home. He even offered to provide a "home away from home" for an Iranian student who felt uncomfortable in his dormitory.

The cartoon may give readers a wrong impression of Dr. Hofman. While Mr. Cashin was not making a personal attack, I wonder whether he intended to get a good laugh at the expense of the professor. Too bad, Mr. Cashin in his endeavor to be a cartoonist does not have the sensitivity of Dr. Hofman. Maybe he could learn to deal with sensitive issues with finesse.

Irish-Lion confrontation arrives

Before his career is over, Curt Warner (25) most likely will be Penn State's all-time leading rusher. See story page 9. (AP Photo)

Two teams seem headed in opposite directions

By CHRIS NEEDLES
Sports Writer

UNIVERSITY PARK, Pa. — A local food market here has been running a radio ad all season long that, like most other ads and billboards in this part of the country, extolls the praises of Penn State football. This particular ad, though, was unique: "We're No. 1," says the grocer, "and we'll go undefeated..."

"Until we play Notre Dame," he adds skeptically.

One has to be a resident of Pennsylvania to realize the emotional significance of tomorrow's battle between Notre Dame and 14th-ranked Penn State at Beaver Stadium. In this part of the country, a collection of small towns in a 150-mile radius of the university, folks thrive on their local high school's football game on Friday nights, and then gather around the radio on Saturday afternoons to cheer on Penn State.

Those Pennsylvanians who, God forbid, don't like Penn State prefer to root for Notre Dame. Don't worry — nobody likes Pitt.

So that is why, despite both teams' disappointing records, tomorrow's battle with the Irish is considered to be, without a doubt, the Nittany Lions' biggest game of the season. The Beaver Stadium attendance record, 85,133, set last week against Alabama, should fall once again.

Rain is in the forecast for this afternoon, but it should turn much colder with a possibility of snow flurries by game time, with temperatures in the 30's.

The showdown is a tale of two teams going in vastly different directions. Coach Gerry Faust's Irish (5-4) have won three in a row in impressive fashion, having outscored the opposition 104-10 in that period, since a 14-7 loss to Southern California on October 24.

On the other hand, Penn State is hurting. "We've got a tremendous job ahead of us this week," says Head Coach Joe Paterno, in his 16th season at the helm. "We're not a very good football team right now. We're not playing well and we are playing a team that is in a groove right now."

Paterno isn't trying to deceive Irish fans, either. After winning its first six games with ease and ascending to the top of the polls, Penn State has dropped two of its last three contests — a 17-14 loss at Miami (Fla.) on October 31 and last week's anemic 31-16 defeat at the hands of Alabama, surrounding an unimpressive 22-15 win at North Carolina State.

Part of the Lions' problems of late has been an injury to star tailback Curt Warner, who needs just 72 yards rushing to become only the fifth Penn State running back to gain 1,000 yards in a season and should break Lydell Mitchell's career rushing record before his college career is over.

Warner, a junior from Wyoming, W.Va., pulled a hamstring in mid-season and missed all or parts of three games, but returned last week to tally 69 yards against the Crimson Tide.

Warner has a pair of 200-yard efforts this year, having rushed for a school-record 256 yards against Syracuse and 238 against Nebraska. He was a legitimate Heisman Trophy candidate before his injury. Sophomore Jon Williams has picked up 472 yards as Warner's understudy.

Penn State has also suffered a breakdown in its passing game. After passing for a school-record 358 yards in the Miami loss, sophomore quarterback Todd Blackledge has slumped badly. Last Saturday, the North Canton, Ohio, native completed just 8 of 28 attempts for only 94 yards with three interceptions. Blackledge has thrown ten touchdown passes this season, but has also been intercepted 12 times.

Even the kicking game is in dire straits for the Nittany Lions. Punter Ralph Giacomarro has been getting a lot of practice of late, and has responded with a 44.7-yard average. But placekicker Brian Franco, a hero early in the season, is having his difficulties. After single-handedly lifting Penn State over Nebraska with five field goals in the Lions' 30-24 victory in September, Franco has slumped, hitting his nadir by missing four makeable field goal attempts in the Miami game.

The normally stalwart Lion defense was shredded for 469 total yards last week by 'Bama after yielding over 300 yards each of the previous two weeks. Mark Robinson, a sophomore free safety, leads the defense with 57 tackles and junior defensive end Walker Lee Ashley has six quarterback sacks and has forced two fumbles. Defensive back Roger Jackson, a junior, paces PSU with four interceptions.

Penn State always been blessed with fine linebackers, and this year is no exception. Seniors Chet Parlavecchio, Matt Bradley and Ed Pryts rank second, third and fourth respectively in tackles.

But the defense, much like the rest of the team, has not been on top of its game lately. "We've got to get some things straightened out," admits Paterno. "We have a lot of hard work ahead of us to correct the things that are hurting this team."

"Those corrections are too numerous to even get into. We have many areas that need work right now."

Sound familiar? Four weeks ago, Gerry Faust was making the same remorseful comments

Coaches handle frustration, more

By SKIP DESJARDIN
Associate Sports Editor

Frustration.

Every college football coach can tell you all about it. Bear Bryant gets frustrated when Alabama can't get by Southern Mississippi. Dennis Green gets frustrated when Northwestern can't get by the stadium security guards.

Tomorrow, Joe Paterno and Gerry Faust will stand across the field from one another at Beaver Stadium. They will coach teams that must win to salvage what could have been great seasons.

For one of them, the frustration will continue.

They are remarkably similar, in many ways. For each, academics is the most important factor in the careers of his players.

"People who say winning or losing is all there is to college football are dead wrong," says Paterno. "The most important thing for these players is the education they receive while they are at Penn State."

"We feel that there is more to life, and especially to college life, than football," says the 16-year head coach. "We never practice on Friday. We rarely practice on Monday. These guys have other things to do, and we can't make unreasonable demands of them."

"The primary reason for these men being in college is to get that education. It includes learning in the classroom and out of it. We try to give our players time to get a well-rounded education."

Faust of course, is much the same. He has an impressive athlete-graduation ratio to live up to now that he is the head coach.

"The greatest thing about Notre Dame is the education you can get here," he says. "The opportunities that students have here are fantastic, and I want my players to take full advantage of them. You only go through college once, and you should enjoy it."

Besides their emphasis on the academic side of college football players, Faust and Paterno have other striking similarities. This year, more than most coaches, they have shared that which bonds college coaches together.

Frustration.

Paterno had the Nittany Lions at the top of the polls early this season. But, as has been the case throughout recent history, Penn State was unable to win the big game — this time to Miami.

"We're going through a tough period right now," he says. "Slowly but surely, we're starting to improve our schedule, and we're feeling it. We opened a new era here by playing Alabama."

There are those who say that Paterno's biggest frustration is in never having won a national championship. He has been close a number of times, but "the big one" has always eluded him. A number of factors, including a habitually weak schedule, have contributed to that sad fact. And it is sad — for it can be said that Joe Paterno is one of the truly great coaches in football today.

Things may be changing, however. Paterno, who doubles as Penn State's athletic director, is building a tougher schedule for the Lions. The realization that it's gotten tougher to win a national championship by playing Temple and Cincinnati has a lot to do with that decision.

"We opened a new era of Penn State football with the game against Alabama," he says. "And the Notre Dames and Texas are coming up. We have to learn how to beat them. That's the next step for us."

"There's no sense in playing teams like that if you are not going to beat them."

Frustration.

"Sure, it's frustrating," said Faust after the Irish fell from number one by losing four of its next five games. "I think it's probably been the most difficult part of my life. God must be testing me."

The Gerry Faust story is well-known. Irish fans everywhere have shared in a little of the exasperation the coach and his players have been suffering through all year. But things are starting to roll again.

"We're looking better all the time," Faust says. "But it was a long, hard road."

It will be the classic match-up. The established coach, respected by his peers, a veteran of every conceivable type of battle in the college football war, matches wits with the young upstart who rose quickly through the ranks, and continues to impress his colleagues.

Linemen think trench war could be key to the game

By MIKE SULLIVAN
Sports Writer

"It will be a trench war," says Notre Dame Defensive Line Coach Bill Meyers.

"There will be a lot of give and take," says Dick Anderson, offensive line coach at Penn State.

Coaches and players from both teams agree that there will be an intense battle when the highly respected offensive line of the Nittany Lions faces the rapidly improving Irish defensive line of Bob Clasy, Tim Marshall, and company.

The Penn State line, led by 6-2, 263-pound guard Sean Farrell, a consensus all-American last year as a junior and an Outland Trophy candidate this year, was believed to be one of the best in the country at the beginning of the season.

"They don't have many weaknesses," observes Irish nose tackle Bob Clasy. "They are strong and big and really come off the ball."

The other tackle, Tim Marshall, agrees. "They have good strength and quickness and are very well-balanced."

Anderson is more specific. "Our guards are our strong point. They both are excellent and can run. We have gotten pretty good play from center for most of the year. Our tackles also play pretty well despite a lack of experience."

He is not sure, however, just how good his line; guards Farrell and Mike Munchak, a 6-2, 257-pound junior, center Jim Romano, a 6-3, 241-pound senior, and tackles Pete Speros, a 6-2, 248-pound junior and Bill Contz, a 6-5, 243-pound junior; really is. "We started out well but haven't done well in the last two games. We looked very bad against Alabama. It's a good line, just how good is hard to tell right now. We'll see in the Notre Dame and Pitt games. We just need to get over our bumps and bruises."

Farrell, one of the team captains, is the mainstay of the line. "Physically," explains Anderson, "he has more than one thing going for him. He is a strong kid, has good size, and runs well. He is smart and doesn't make many mistakes. He is also a strong leader who adds maturity to the team."

Nittany Lion Head Coach Joe Paterno is even more generous in his praise of Farrell. "Farrell is as good a lineman as we have had at Penn State since I have been coaching here."

The Irish are definitely ready to fight back, though. "It will be a very physical contest," predicts Meyers. We play a physical, hard-nosed game and try to dominate the line of scrimmage."

Anderson adds, "Notre Dame has a big front which allows the linebackers to be active. The nose tackle is a real big, strong guy."

The player to whom Anderson is referring is 6-5, 260-pound Bob Clasy. The junior from Milton, Mass., now has 45 tackles, including five for losses, and two pass blocks, while usually lining up right over the ball.

"Clasy is an intense, extremely physical player," says Meyers.

Clasy does not disagree with his coach's description. "I try to stuff the man across from me into the backfield and keep him off of the linebackers. I am not too quick but I use my strength and size as an advantage."

He feels that he is now playing his best football of the year. "In the Purdue game, I was playing my best football of the year. Then I was injured. The injury really hampered me. I started playing well again in the Southern Cal game and I've been playing better ever since then."

He believes that his line can get the best of the Nittany Lions. "We watched the Alabama game last week and saw how the Alabama defensive line really attacked their line and was successful. That's the way we play, too."

"I am really looking forward to the game. My family is going to be there. I'm really going to go to town. I was heavily recruited by the eastern teams, including Penn State. I know some of the guys on their line. Sean Farrell was my host when I visited the school."

Clasy will not be the only one responsible for plugging up the middle. Tim Marshall is also looking forward to a hard game.

The 6-4, 250-pound sophomore has amassed 33 tackles this year, with nine of his tackles coming in the opponents' backfield.

Meyers describes Marshall as "very quick. He has a good sense for the game and for the football. He has improved every game."

Marshall, himself, is pleased with his improvement. "It bothered me when I started off slowly, but I am coming around. My biggest

Three-of-a-kind means full house for Irish backfield

By JOHN LEWANDOWSKI
Sports Writer

It is quite apparent that parity has been reached in college football. However, not only have the NCAA limitations on scholarships created a balance on the collegiate level but it has caused the competition for individual playing time to intensify.

Notre Dame boasts one of the most talented trios of fullbacks in the nation. John Sweeney, Larry Moriarty and Mark Brooks have all made significant contributions while being shuffled in and out of the lineup.

No one is more pleased to be associated with the threesome than Irish running back coach Greg Blache. "It is a luxury to have a crop of talented fullbacks," explains Blache. "We're blessed with three fine athletes, but more importantly fine people. They're very unselfish and play with a total team attitude."

Twenty-year-old junior John Sweeney anchors the contingent. The Deerfield, Ill., native is the team's third leading rusher with 146 yards. Sweeney has also hauled in 6 passes for 96 yards.

A three-year starter, Sweeney knows his role at Notre Dame. "I'm not the star who's going to score some points or rush for 100 yards," frankly explains Sweeney. "I firmly believe in a team effort. I go out there and do my best and just try to contribute to a victory."

The responsibilities of the Irish fullbacks are numerous but Sweeney enjoys being more involved. "I do a lot of communicating with the wingback and halfback. I help solidify the entire backfield by recognizing the defenses. This is where my experience fits in."

Sweeney, who lost his starting position to Moriarty prior to the season opener with LSU, will be the first to admit that he has benefited from the competition for the position.

"Competition makes me play better. My two running mates are fine athletes, who have proved themselves. I just enjoy helping them out."

Sweeney certainly has impressed Coach Blache with his style of play. "Honestly, John is the least talented out of the bunch as far as natural ability," says Blache. "But he's a war-horse. He plays with great intensity and has experience you can't buy." The explosive and bruising Larry Moriarty backstops Sweeney. The junior from Santa Barbara, Calif., has chalked up 87 markers on 19 carries including a touchdown. Moriarty, a specialty team standout, has also notched two touchdown receptions in just three catches.

Moriarty knows all about the struggle for playing time. "Notre Dame, as well as the other major powers, always has great competition at the different positions," explains the 23-year-old communications major. "I'm a little unhappy about not seeing more action. I still feel that I haven't shown but one-fourth of my talent."

The head-to-head confrontations end on the field, however. "Our relationship is great, it really is," says Moriarty. "We leave our frustrations on the football field and that's the way it should be. We're battling out there to impress the coaches not each other."

And indeed, Moriarty has impressed Blache. "Larry is the most talented fullback," says the former assistant to Ara Parseghian. "He's awesomely strong and has great speed. He's also a fine pass-catcher with hands like a baseball mit."

Freshman Mark Brooks, who has logged the most playing minutes behind Sweeney, came to Notre Dame as one of the most decorated high school graduates in the country. The former Cincinnati Moeller standout has picked up 124 yards at 5.6 yards per pop.

For Brooks, being in contention at the position has been a beneficial learning experience. "Sweeney and Moriarty are both good teachers," explains the soft-spoken freshman. "The entire adjustment to college life has been a learning experience."

"I really didn't feel any extra pressure coming out of high school," says Brooks. "I'm just getting to know the system and feel right at home."

Although just a freshman, Brooks recognizes his part in the backfield. "At this particular point, I simply want to help out when I'm called upon. It's taken awhile for me to adjust to the different defensive looks and the competition at fullback has kept me on my toes."

Blache, who's worked with some great backs at Notre Dame, says, "Brooks is going to be great. He's still a puppy but he's learning everyday. He's a blend of both Sweeney and Moriarty."

What impresses Coach Blache most about the fullbacks is the manner in which they have shown a total team attitude. "I really can't do much to keep the guys happy but they each have a special maturity about them. I truly believe that being a part of Notre Dame breeds camaraderie. That's the main reason why I'm in coaching."

about his struggling Irish, and he can sympathize with his coaching counterpart. "Penn State's gone through losses like we did at the beginning of the year," comments the first-year coach. "I really feel that, despite their two losses, they're one of the top six to eight teams in the country."

On the contrary, Notre Dame seems to have found the right combinations after instituting position changes four weeks ago. Greg Bell (wingback), Tony Hunter (tight end) and Joe Howard (split end) all have excelled in their new roles. Quarterback Blair Kiel has fully recovered from the flu bug, and should be at full strength.

And, for the first time in a while, the Irish have no major injury problems to speak of. Jon

Autry and Rick Naylor are questionable, but should be able to play. So, it seems that Notre Dame will have all the momentum going for it tomorrow. "I think our momentum is growing," says Faust. "They have a lot more confidence in themselves and appear to be enjoying football again."

"Tomorrow, we'll see how much momentum we've gained since the USC game."

But, in no way is Faust taking Penn State lightly. "They're one of the finest teams in the country," he says. "They are very experienced on offense and defense. Their linebackers and secondary are very tenacious and they'll be a real challenge."

"PSU gives any defense a lot to think about, also, for two reasons: first, they've got two great runners in Warner and Williams, and they have great receivers and a strong quarterback. They'll create a lot of problems for us."

If their problems on the field aren't enough, the Lions have had one additional obstacle to overcome this week. "Our main problem this week has been final exams," Paterno told The Observer last night. "We've had trouble getting enough players to practice with and there hasn't been much enthusiasm around the campus this week. But by Saturday, we'll be ready."

IRISH ITEMS: The Irish arrived here last night and stayed in nearby Harrisburg, the state capital, which is about an hour or so from the campus. The game is also being shown on a delayed basis by ESPN. The last time the two teams met in the regular season was 1928, when the Irish beat the Lions, 9-0, in Philadelphia. Their last meeting overall was the 1976 Gator Bowl, which Notre Dame captured, 20-9.

Warner running for record books at Penn State

By TOM VEDUCCI
Penn State Daily Collegian

UNIVERSITY PARK, Pa. — He was only 12 years old, but he already had doubts about his football future.

Curt Warner came out for Raymond Rose's seventh and eighth grade football team as a small and skinny pre-teen. He wanted to be a running back, but he couldn't beat out his older brother Robert for the starting position. Rose told him to work out as an end.

"I didn't like being an end," Warner remembers. "For no reasons in particular; I just didn't like it."

Not only was the youth unhappy with his position, but he also was uninspired by the sport itself. "I didn't care too much for football. I wasn't crazy about going out there and getting my head beat in every day."

Warner only could do his best and wait for his favorite sports — basketball and baseball — to come around.

"My senior year I decided to play all three," Warner says. "I'd see which one I did best and continue with that."

Luckily for Joe Paterno and Penn State, Warner had a great senior year on the football field. Measured statistically, it was more than 2,500 yards worth of greatness.

And the greatness keeps adding up. Sometime next season, Curt Warner — once a skinny end not good enough to play running back — probably will become the career rushing leader at the Pennsylvania State University. That's ahead of Franco Harris. Ahead of Lenny Moore. Ahead of John Capalletti. And ultimately, ahead of Lydell Mitchell.

Pinesville is playing Chapmansville in a West Virginia state playoff game. It is the third quarter and Pineville already has put the game out of reach. Pineville halfback Curt Warner carries the ball up to the one-yard line to set up yet another score. Coach Raymond Rose takes Warner out and sends on a sophomore to score the touchdown.

Rose wasn't aware of it, but Warner could have broken the state single-game scoring mark. Instead, Curt will have to be content with five touchdowns, three two-point conversions, and more than 400 yards rushing.

Warner was a legend in high school. His achievements will live forever, especially in the mind of Rose, now retired from coaching.

Rose had the pleasure of coaching Warner in the seventh and eighth grades, and as a junior and senior in high school. He recalls the time Warner carried the ball just seven times in one high school game, yet scored four times. He remembers the playoff game in which his team had the ball on fourth-and-goal at the 12, and Warner "got hit about six times" and scored.

Curt grew up under modest conditions in southern West Virginia. You will find his address listed as R.D. 1, Wyoming, W. Va., but you'd never find his home if you were looking for a town. His house was one of a few scattered about the coal-mining region that answered to the name Wyoming.

To get to his high school, you have to drive more than two hours to cover the last 30 miles after pulling off the nearest interstate. The roads go up, down and around many of the mountains of the Allegheny range.

But somehow, college recruiters found Curt Warner.

It is basketball season, and Warner and Pineville are hosting arch rival Mullins in one of the biggest games of the season. Pineville's gym seats just 900, but among the crowd this night, are Pitt's Jackie Sherrill, Penn State's Joe Paterno and an assistant to Nebraska's Tom Osborne. After the game all three take their turns talking with Warner. Paterno gets the last and longest word in. Paterno, who never saw the kid play football, nevertheless offers him a scholarship.

Warner does not remember exactly how many schools recruited him. He made only three trips — to Penn State, West Virginia and Pittsburgh — and missed out on a trip to Notre Dame because of a snow storm.

He felt much pressure to stay in town and work in Morgantown, but he fought that pressure and chose Penn State.

"I caught a lot of flack for not going to West Virginia," he says. "I just didn't like their program. At Penn State I liked the guys on the team who I met. I got along with Coach Paterno really well. I just liked the big time atmosphere."

It is opening day, 1979, and Penn State is playing host to Rutgers. Number 25 for the Lions has the crowd scurrying through their programs to find out who this phenom is. He is Curt Warner. He has burst on to the local and national college football scene with 280 all-purpose yards. He is the Associated Press Back of the Week.

"I didn't expect anything like that at all," Warner says. "I expected to play only a little on kickoff returns. In fact, I remember telling my pop the night before the game I probably wouldn't play that much."

After the game and for the next week Warner was besieged by the media. They were impressed not only by his performance, but also by the fact that he was a freshman — a football type usually kept under lock and key by Paterno.

In interviews he was quiet; in fact, he was barely audible. His sentences were short and plain. But inside, Warner was caught up in a whirlwind of publicity.

He kept his feelings inside himself. "I let it go too far," Warner recalls. "I started listening to the quotes. I listened too much. Your head swells up if you let it get too far."

"I've learned from that. I can call it a mistake for me. I've learned to be humble within myself."

What really humbled Warner was a hamstringing injury. He missed three games and carried a maximum of 15 times in a game for the remainder of the season.

"It was very frustrating," Warner says. "I learned football is not the only thing in life. There are other things I must do, because at any time in life it can be over for you."

Warner carried 84 times for 391 yards that year, and Penn State struggled through an 8-4 season.

"My freshman year was very disappointing," he says. "There was not much team unity."

The last time Penn State and Notre Dame met was the 1976 Gator Bowl, and Ross

Browner harassed Chuck Fusina in a 20-9 win for the Irish.

It is October 17, 1981. Warner has a day against Syracuse that no other Penn State running back ever has had against anyone. He shreds the Syracuse defense for 256 yards on 26 carries.

Warner has changed since his debut against Rutgers in 1979. Paterno says he has become a more patient runner, and the tailback agrees.

"My freshman year I'd just go out to break every play," he says. "Now I've learned a lot as far as knowing where to go; knowing what might go and what can't go."

Indeed, Warner never was so smart a runner. He knows how to get the most out of his blocking — a smart thing to do considering the offensive line includes one 1980 all-American (Sean Farrell) and two potential all-Americans (Mike Munchak and Jim Romano).

Warner, who is reluctant to talk about himself, jumps at the chance to talk about the line. Ask him how good his performance was, and he'll tell you how good the line was. When you finally get him to talk about his running, he makes it sound oh-so-easy.

"I'm a very emotional person. Now I keep it all to myself. If I don't carry the ball, it's not going to hamper anyone else. I keep a low profile. I don't want to lose my poise."

He keeps his emotions inside himself. Since his record-setting performance at Syracuse, Warner has run into hard times. Achilles had his heel. Warner has his hamstring. He pulled a hamstring in practice the following week, and sat out the West Virginia game. Warner came back October 31 against Miami, but gained just 21 yards on 13 carries before leaving with another pulled muscle.

Again he took a week off — watching the Lions beat N.C. State — and when he came back last week against Alabama, he was limited to 69 yards on 18 carries. That raised his season totals to 928 yards on 146 carries as he tries to become only the fifth Penn State to run for 1,000 yards in a season.

It's ironic the very tools of Warner's trade — his delicate leg muscles — held him back from joining the list of Heisman Trophy candidates this year. But if he's not the best college football player in the country this year, maybe he will be next year.

His is a long and improbable success story. Warner was a great athlete in a backward environment. He was mined out of that environment, and became extremely valuable, much like the coal that is extracted from the very mountains that surround his home.

And this is the sort of success story from which fairy tales are made. The skinny seventh grade end, who becomes a high school legend, who becomes a college star who wins the Heisman Trophy?

"I've thought about that for a long time," Warner says. "I guess it's one of those childhood dreams we all have. One of these days I'll get a shot at it. How close I'll come, I don't know."

If he does reach that pinnacle, he probably won't be able to keep his feelings inside himself.

... Matchup

"It will be a thrill to coach against him," says Paterno. "I've met Gerry a number of times, and have been very impressed. He is going to be a great football coach."

Joe Paterno

That's high praise coming from a man as universally admired as Paterno, a fact Faust readily admires.

"Joe Paterno is one of the great coaches and gentlemen in the profession," the rookie coach says. "It will be an honor to coach across the field from the guy."

Amenities aside, the two men will be struggling to save face tomorrow. Faust wants desperately to win his last two games and finish 7-4. Paterno is looking to take his team to the Fiesta Bowl in a never-ending search for nation-wide respectability.

"We think we've made great strides in the last four weeks, and now we have an excellent opportunity to find out how good a team we really are," Faust says.

Paterno obviously sees this weekend as key to the Lions' fortunes. "It's hard to believe," he admits, "but we were looking ahead last week against Alabama. Final exams were held this week, and Notre Dame is coming to town."

"We've got to get some things straightened out. We have many areas that need work right now. We've got a tremendous job ahead of us this week."

When all is said and done, only one man will have come through the encounter relatively unscathed. It will be but a temporary reprieve, however. There is an opponent that can be thwarted, but not defeated; an opponent that comes back to haunt the best coaches — and especially the not-so-great.

Frustration.

problem this year was adjusting to the new coaches. It took a while to get used to the new ways of motivating the players. Now I think that I have proved myself over last year."

How does it feel to face such a respected line? "No one is invincible," says Marshall. "I'm not intimidated and neither are the other guys, I like the challenge. It helps me use my skills better."

Meyers and Anderson agree that the game will be a tough one and the team that is most consistent and does not make mistakes will win.

"We'll be ready!" announces Tim Marshall.

The SMC Turkey Trot is scheduled for Monday at 4 p.m. The three-mile run is open to everyone in the Saint Mary's community. First, second and third place prizes will be presented in each of these three categories: students, male staff/faculty and female staff/faculty. Interested runners must register by bringing the $1 entry fee to the Angela Athletic Facility before Friday. For more information, contact Mr. Dillon at 4182 (SMC). — The Observer

Another trip to Michigan is next on the agenda for the Notre Dame wrestling team. Coach Brother Joe Bruno's wrestlers will participate in the Michigan Invitational Tournament on Saturday. Last week five team members placed at the Michigan State Tournament in East Lansing. The trip to Ann Arbor is the third of six straight meets on the road before the home opener on December 9. — The Observer

Los Angeles Laker Coach Paul Westhead, who was blasted Wednesday night by star Earvin "Magic" Johnson, was fired yesterday by team owner Dr. Jerry Buss. Buss named former coach and star player Jerry West to head the offense for the Lakers, with a co-coach, Pat Riley, handling the defense in a unique NBA situation. Buss said that the 22-year-old Johnson had nothing to do with his decision. — AP

Notre Dame's Rowing Club will hold a mandatory practice for the men's varsity tomorrow at 10 a.m. in the ACC Fieldhouse. Novices are welcome. — The Observer

NCAA basketball

Southern schools rated highly

ATLANTA (AP) — Coach Joe B. Hall of Kentucky says pre-season basketball ratings won't mean much this year because "there's an awful lot of balance."

Hall's Wildcats, a perennial Southeastern Conference power, are likely to be highly rated this season along with several other Southern powers, including 1981 national runner-up North Carolina and third-place finisher Virginia of the Atlantic Coast Conference, Louisville of the Metro Conference and Alabama-Birmingham of the Sun Belt Conference.

"There's an awful lot of talent spread all over the country and until eight or 10 games are played, you really can't tell," Hall said. "There will be some teams come out of the pack that are equally as good as those that are ranked high."

With 7-1 Sam Bowie sidelined with a fractured shin bone, Kentucky could have trouble just trying to win the SEC. Georgia, a newcomer to the league's basketball elite, and Alabama return enough starters to give the talent-laden Wildcats a fight.

Bowie wore a cast for eight weeks, but Hall recently said the bone had not healed as expected and his star center could miss a month or more of the season.

Coach Dean Smith lost All-American forward Al Wood from last year's team, but North Carolina figures to be the strongest outfit in the South this year.

The front line will feature two talented 6-9 performers — James Worthy and Sam Perkins — and Jimmy Black returns to run the attack from point guard. The Tar Heels are counting heavily on 6-4 freshman Michael Jordan, who has a 42-inch vertical leap.

"By the players we have returning, we should have a good team," Smith said. "But we can't have any false confidence. We're young. We'll learn what we have to work with early."

Virginia lost two outstanding players in Jeff Lamp and Lee Raker, but the Cavaliers can't be counted out of the picture because of one man — 7-4 Ralph Sampson, college basketball's Player of the Year last season.

Wake Forest, with four starters back, and Clemson also could be in contention in the ACC race.

Louisville, which has one national title under Denny Crum, has every starter returning from a team that had a horrendous start a year ago before coming on late and returning to the NCAA tournament.

"Naturally we would be picked to win, but the Metro has had a lot of surprises in the past and anything can happen in this league," Crum said.

The Cardinals feature Derrick Smith, last year's Metro Co-Player of the Year, the McCray's — Rodney and Scooter — and point guard Jerry Eaves.

Cincinnati, led by Bobby Austin finished second in last year's Metro Tourney and should be the closest challenger to Louisville again. Virginia Tech, which has one of the league's top players in Dale Solomon, and Florida State could horn its way into the picture, too.

With Bowie's status unknown at Kentucky, Georgia could draw some support as the pre-season SEC favorite. The Bulldogs are led by Dominique Wilkins, a leaper with spectacular moves who led the SEC in scoring last year.

Alabama also returns most of last year's team, including all-conference performer Eddie Phillips.

Tennessee figures to be in the race, but defending champion Louisiana State, which finished fourth in the NCAA last year, lost most of its talent, although it does return Howard Carter and Leonard Mitchell, two starters.

The Sun Belt features two coaches who have carried two or more different schools to the NCAA tournament — Gene Bartow of University of Alabama-Birmingham and Lee Rose of South Florida. Bartow got the Blazers into the tournament last year and earlier in his career went with Memphis State and UCLA. Rose carried the first Sun Belt champion, North Carolina-Charlotte, to the Final Four and then went to Purdue, which also made an NCAA tourney appearance.

Bartow has the preseason favorite, a team led by the smooth style of Oliver Robinson. The question will be how well UAB replaces Glenn Marcus, who ran the team from point guard.

Virginia Commonwealth, which also went to the NCAA last year, and two National Invitation Tournament teams, South Alabama and Rose's South Florida club, are expected to make the Sun Belt race a four-team affair.

Western Carolina has four starter almost 34 points a game last year — and generally is considered the team to beat in the Southern Conference. For the second consecutive season, the conference will experiment with the 3-point field goal at the NCAA's request.

Furman, which got 22 points a game from Mel Daniel last year, figures to be the most serious challenger to the Catamounts. Appalachian and Tennessee-Chattanooga also must be considered.

Moher, Fairholm

Former players coach icers

By MICHAEL OLENIK
Sports Writer

They might not be in the middle of the spotlight, but Len Moher and Terry Fairholm seem pretty satisfied with the position that they are in. You see, both are in their second year as Lefty Smith's right and left hand men, and this time it's not as Smith's most relied upon players.

The importance of these two to the Irish hockey program now lies on the bench and in the locker room, as the two former teammates from the 1974 through 1978 Notre Dame hockey editions combine for what is considered in league hockey circles to be a very solid coaching staff.

Moher, a standout goaltender all four of his college years, serves as Smith's full-time assistant and recruiting coordinator, a job that keeps him more than busy.

"I coach the goaltenders and the defensemen, and I also recruit. During the games I sit in the press box to diagram what we are doing and to see what adjustments are needed."

Moher's experience in the crease gives him a chance to coach the defense from a different perspective, as he is quick to point out. "Hey, I've played with defensemen enough to know what a goaltender looks for. I almost equate the goalie with a quarterback with respect to the defense, because of the way that he directs his teammates. Because I'm the only goalie coach in the league, I think we have a little extra advantage."

Moher seems intent on stressing Notre Dame's recruiting philosophy. Despite losing a good number of prime recruits each year due to Notre Dame's high academic standards, the native of Wellesley, Mass., offers positive comments on the system as a whole.

"The hockey program here at Notre Dame is successful. We've been consistently ranked nationally, and that draws the attention of many quality players. I tell the recruits that they can get the best of the athletic and academic world. As I've said, the commitment to academics is genuine — every hockey player in 13 years has earned a degree."

As far as his continued involvement in hockey, Moher sees only positive repercussions. "Hockey is the type of sport that is difficult to walk away from. I am fortunate to be able to come back here to get a coaching start. It would be foolish to think that I wouldn't get at least a shot at a job at another major school someday, so I'd have to say that I'm satisfied with the way things are going."

The long range plans of Fairholm might include full-time coaching, but the immediate future is clearly marked for the Quebec native. As coach of the forwards, the former winger finds himself in the classroom as much as on the ice — he is presently enrolled in the Masters of Business Administration program here at Notre Dame.

Despite paying considerable attention to the books, Fairholm spends much of his time musing of offensive strategy and possible line combinations. "I am fully responsible for the forwards and our scoring strategy. I formulate the lineups and decide who goes on the ice at what time during the course of the game."

Surprisingly, this former goal-scoring leader receives more satisfaction from a spectator's point of view. "I certainly enjoy coaching more than playing, although I do miss taking a more active part in the game. It definitely is a whole new point of view from behind the bench, but it can be very satisfying."

Confronted with a question about this year's hockey team, Fairholm refuses to believe that the Irish are anything less than a quality team.

"I really think we have a helluva team. We've got our share of youth, talent, and a good attitude. I know the coaching staff is enthusiastic, so it's just a matter of raising everyone up to their best level. If we go out and work hard, we'll be in every game."

Bad times or not, the Irish hockey team is far from out of the picture, a belief firmly held by these two coaches who have seen this show before. Hopefully, it won't take an appearance on the ice to show that they want to see success, although such a thought might have crossed both of their minds.

State squad.

Olympic followers will remember that Yugoslavia's national basketball team won the gold medal in 1980 at Moscow. But this is not the same team. Coach Ranko Zeravica led that team to the Olympic medal, but he has much less talent to work with in this squad. Nevertheless, Phelps sees this as a good team for Notre Dame to start out with.

"They'll be a good test for us," he says. "We need to see how we can do against a big team. It'll also give us a chance to work on our offenses, and especially our defenses, in preparation for the regular season. Besides, it's always good to get actual play in a game situation under our belts before the season gets started. This'll be a real challenge."

Irish play host to Ohio State

By MICHAEL OLENIK
Sports Writer

A feeling of immediacy is being felt by Lefty Smith and his 2-5-1 hockey team, as last week's two losses to Michigan State has left the Irish with only one victory in their last six league games. There is hope however, that the Ohio State Buckeyes will provide the prey that is needed to set the Irish back on the winning ways they enjoyed early in the season.

The season has not had positive overtones for the team from Columbus either, as Ohio State is mired in tenth place of the CCHA, one notch below the struggling Irish. The tie and a loss in the 1-4-1 Buckeye record stems from the league opening series between the two teams back in October, and it is very likely that Jerry Welsh's team will be looking for some type of retaliation.

"They (Notre Dame) have proven they're not a mystical team by the way they've been playing lately," said Welsh of the Irish this week. "When we faced them earlier, they played extremely well and would have been tough for anyone to beat. We know their personnel now, and know which players to key on. Plus, we played so badly against them the first time that I don't really think they saw the team we really are. I don't force us playing as badly his time."

Welch's confidence lies primarily in the play of senior center Larry Marson and defenseman Dan Mandich, also in his last year. On the season, the two rank one and two in the Buckeye scoring charts as they have picked up from a year ago when both collected all-CCHA post season honors.

Scoring, however, is not the story behind Ohio State's game plan. Instead, they seem right at home when they play the game in a physical manner, as Irish defenseman Jim Brown testified after the early season encounter.

"Ohio State can definitely be classified as a rough and physical team. I know they dished out their share of shots throughout the series, but we handled ourselves pretty well."

For a tenth place team, the Buckeyes boast a relatively solid goaltending tandem, as John Damrath and John Dougan have combined for a 3.89 g.a. in league games. Damrath's 3.12 average places him ninth in a league that is being dominated by good goaltending — a fact that the Irish need not be reminded of.

Reasons for Notre Dame's recent play are hard to pinpoint for any observer, but Smith certainly gave a good attempt early this week. "I wish I could point to one specific thing, but actually it's a combination of problems which are causing us to lose. We are just not executing the basic fundamentals of hockey. And until we do, we will continue to play as we have been."

A shakeup in the first three lines gave the Irish offense some balance against the Spartans last week, and it will be the same type of balance that will facilitate a team comeback if there is to be one.

With Bill Rothstein now teamed with Kirt Bjork and Jeff Logan, the Irish have a strong second line to compliment the solid first shift of Dave Poulin, Jeff Perry and John Deasey.

Rothstein has taken over as point leader with 13 (3 goals, 10 assists), while Perry and Bjork pace the goal scorers with five apiece in league play.

Despite being tainted by last week's series, David Laurion remains stable in the nets with a 3.86 g.a. and a league-leading 233 saves. Consistently good play from Laurion will be necessary if the team is to change the current trend, and the time and place for the change is here and now to Assistant Coach Len Moher.

"The problem is definitely more basic than line changes," offers Moher. "We aren't passing, skating and shooting as good we can."

There is no doubt that an improvement in all three departments will be needed if the Irish wish to erase the last three weekends from memory. Starting time for both games is set for 7:30, with tickets available at the Gate 10 box office.

The unclear bowl picture

By SKIP DESJARDIN
Associate Sports Editor

Usually, it's pretty worthless to try to guess who will play in what bowl game. Somebody always messes you up by losing the day after you make your predictions public.

The exception this year is that things appear to be just a bit clearer than in the past...for now. This weekend will make all the difference in the world.

January 1, 1982

Rose Bowl — Pasadena — 3 p.m.: Does two consecutive Rose Bowl bids a dynasty make? They are hoping just that in Washington and Michigan. But there are obstacles for both teams. Washington State needs only a win or a tie to make it to Pasadena. The Wolverines have to get by Ohio State, something they've not always been successful at. Wouldn't it serve the high-and-mighty Rose Bowl execs right if the game was Iowa vs. Washington State? That's not too far-fetched.

Cotton Bowl — Dallas — 1 p.m.: Neither Texas nor Alabama should be in Dallas on New Year's Day, but they will be. The Longhorns should be at home — SMU is the best in the Southwest Conference, but they are on probation. The Tide should be in the Superdome — they are the best team in the Southeast Conference, despite what Vince Dooley says. The only good thing about this game is that the two teams make a lot of money.

Sugar Bowl — New Orleans — 8 p.m.: How 'bout them Dawgs? For the second straight year, they go crawling into this game with their tails between their legs, hoping nobody will notice that they never play conference rivals Alabama, Mississippi State or LSU. And Pittsburgh should hang their heads as well. If they had any guts, they'd be in Tempe playing Clemson for a real national championship, not trying to sneak in the back door. These two teams are the scum of the NCAA.

Orange Bowl — Miami — 8 p.m.: Give credit where it's due. The Huskers of Nebraska shook off a slow start and won the Big Eight going away. They deserve to be here, even if they lose to Oklahoma. Clemson is in the midst of their greatest season ever, but they better enjoy it while they can. Get a good look at them, folks. They'll be on probation before you can say "recruiting violations."

Fiesta Bowl — Tempe, Arizona — 2 p.m.: By all rights, the first New Year's Day edition of this bowl should be for all the marbles. It was a match made in heaven. Undefeated Pitt against undefeated Clemson. Instead, you're likely to get runner-up USC against always-a-bridesmaid Penn State. That's some consolation, however. It should be a far more exciting game than Texas-Alabama.

December 30

Liberty Bowl — Memphis — 8 p.m.: If you're one of those who's heard that Notre Dame will be in

Skip Desjardin
Associate Sports Editor

Memphis between Christmas and New Year's Day, forget it. Faust wants a bowl game, and so do some of the players. But Fr. Joyce and others don't think the Irish should lower themselves to go to a "minor bowl." So much for the dream match-up with Ohio State. It now looks as though Navy will go bowling, and take on the Buckeyes or Iowa in Mamphis.

December 28

Gator Bowl — Jacksonville — 8 p.m.: North Carolina will travel down the road for a match-up with the Hogs of Arkansas. Kelvin Bryant could have taken the Heels a lot farther than Florida, alas. Lou Holtz may never get to the Cotton Bowl, despite consistently having quality teams. Let's shed a tear for both these teams.

December 26

Sun Bowl — El Paso — 8 p.m.: Oklahoma and Southern Mississippi. The Eagles, who have yet to lose a game, and have tied Alabama, deserve better than this. But don't be surprised if they don't even get this much. If Michigan loses to Ohio State, they could make the trip south. The Sooners will be there one way or the other.

OTHERS

Holiday Bowl: The winner of the Brigham Young-Utah game (bet on BYU) is locked in, and will face the loser of the Washington-Washington State game.

Astro-Bluebonnet Bowl: Look for UCLA and a Big Ten team, depending on who goes to the Rose Bowl.

Garden State Bowl: Tennessee will take on Wisconsin. Sorry, Badger fans, but East Rutherford, N.J. is not Pasadena.

Hall of Fame Bowl: Mississippi State had a lot of potential, but fizzled, so they'll go up against the surprising Jayhawks of Kansas.

Independence Bowl: Texas A&M will match up with the winner of the Oklahoma State-Iowa State game. Big deal.

Tangerine Bowl: The battle of the Cougars could shape up here. If BYU loses to Utah watch for them in Orlando against Houston. But this is a likely place for Southern Mississippi to wind up. That's a shame, they deserve better.

Peach Bowl: West Virginia and quarterback Ollie Luck will take on the winner of the Florida-Florida State game. Two decent teams, from relatively close to Atlanta, should make for a good draw.

Now watch, all these picks will get blown out of the water after this weekend's upsets. But it's entertaining to second-guess. Isn't it?

Yugoslavian squad presents problems

By SKIP DESJARDIN
Associate Sports Editor

Digger Phelps and his assistants have had a tough task this week. They've had to prepare for a team they know nothing about. When Belgrade's Red Star Club from Yugoslavia takes the court at the ACC tonight, they'll be just as much a surprise to the Irish coaching staff as they are to most fans.

There are two Yugoslavian teams touring the country right now, and little information is known about either of them. Even Notre Dame's fabled Sports Information Office has no information on them.

"I've seen them play," says Assistant Coach Gary Brokaw, "but don't ask me any names. All I know is their numbers."

But Notre Dame coaches do have a good idea of what kind of game to expect, if not the abilities of any individuals.

"They are a big team, but they're surprisingly quick," says Brokaw. "They use a lot of long outlet passes, which makes them a good transition team. But they are very methodical, which is typical of teams in international play."

"They'll run the fast break, but instead of trying to hit a teammate with the outlet pass, they'll look to hit a certain spot on the floor. What we have to do is keep them from getting to the spot to catch the pass."

Tonight's game will be a chance for the Irish to see how they can match up physically with a big team. The Yugoslavs run 6-7, 6-7, 6-9 across the frontcourt.

"Yeah, it'll be for us to stay with them on the boards," admits Brokaw. "They are very strong underneath."

"More than that, though, we have to keep full-court pressure on them, and try to force mistakes. We can't let them set up into that methodical offense."

Irish fans can count on seeing a much wider variety of offensive and defensive formations tonight than they did in last Sunday's charity game.

"We're quicker than they are, so we'll try to control the tempo of the game," Brokaw explains. "We want to mix up our defenses as well, just to keep them off-balance a little."

The man to watch for Belgrade is Zoran Radovic. The 19-year-old guard has been burning the nets on the team's American tour. He was 8-10 for 24 points against Drake, and 8-11 for 16 points against James Madison. That percentage is not indicative of the entire Yugoslavian team, but is a hint at the club's shooting ability. Thus far on their tour, they are averaging 56.6 percent from the floor.

Part of the reason that Irish coaches are hopeful of their team's ability to compete with the Yugoslavs on the offensive and defensive boards is the fact that Radovic, a 6-0 guard, is the team's leading rebounder.

Radovic, who will wear number 11 tonight, is a legitimate star — he is averaging 18 points per game on the team's swing through America, and is also averaging five steals per contest.

The Yugoslavs will count on two other players to provide much of the scoring punch. Stevan Karadzic, a 6-4 guard, tallied 10 points, and pulled in six rebounds Monday night against Drake. He'll wear number 9 tonight. Zufer Audija, a 6-7 forward, cashed in for 18 points on an 8-14 performance against a tough N. C.
