Bush hopes to start 'new era'

Associated Press

President-elect George Bush, barely pausing to savor his election triumph, began building a "brand new team" for his incoming Republican administration Wednesday.

Democrats found solace in gains in both houses of the Congress. Bush staged a splashy, flag-waving return to Washington and said he hoped to nourish a "new era rich with possibility and full of hope." He went with Vice President-elect Dan Quayle to the White House to accept President Reagan's congratulations and promise of a smooth transition.

"Time for us to go to work," said the outgoing president, and the new man did.

Bush made his first Cabinet appointment with unusual swiftness, naming longtime confidant James Baker III his secretary of state. He appointed a slate of aides to guide the transition to power.

"The people have spoken and the verdict was clear," the nation's duly chosen leader said.

Bush and Quayle take office on Jan. 20.

Democrat Michael Dukakis took his final bow on the 1988 campaign stage at a news conference in Boston. He congratulated Bush on his victory, but said it was based in large measure on campaign "distortions." Nonetheless, he said he was not resentful, but rather disappointed.

"I gave it my best shot," said the Massachusetts governor.

On his first full day as president-elect, Bush paused to praise his rival.

He said he would do his best to work with the new Democratic Congress. "I don't want us to talk at each other, I want

Dukakis congratulates Bush, says 'I gave it my best shot'

BOSTON-- Defeated Democratic presidential candidate Michael Dukakis on Wednesday congratulated President-elect George Bush on a "decisive victory" and said, "I gave it my best shot" in a losing cause.

At a valedictory campaign news conference in Boston, Dukakis repeated his charges that Republican "media manipulators" resorted to highly negative commercials to defeat him and said the ads took their toll. He said he feared "this would be a signal now at the national level that this kind of campaigning is effective."

Dukakis sidestepped a question about whether he might run again for the White House, saying he was now ready to return to his duties as governor of Massachusetts. "I will be digging into that vigorously and fully," he said.

Dukakis opened his news conference with a statement blending congratulations for Bush with a declaration that the Democratic Party is "truly alive and well and strong."

He made it clear he intends to remain active in party affairs, saying he hoped to make his presence felt as the party picks a new chairman for the next four years.

Dukakis said he wasn't ready to offer a detailed analysis of the campaign, but noted that he lost several states by the World leaders congratulate Bush

LONDON-- World leaders congratulated George Bush on his presidential triumph with a series of positive reactions that cut broadly across party and ideological divisions.

The Soviets said they expected they could work with Bush.

European and Japanese leaders looked forward to continuity of U.S. policy set by President Reagan.

Israel and Egypt welcomed Bush's victory and the Palestine Liberation Organization hoped Bush would champion Palestinian aspirations to statehood.

Nicaraguan and Costa Rican leaders expressed some optimism, but a pro-government newspaper in Managua chided the Bush win.

In many countries, local radio and television stations carried results and live broadcasts through the night.

spokesman Gennady Gerasimov, asked in a telephone interview whether a summit was likely early in the Bush administration, replied: "Yes, it is quite possible in my view-- quite possible."

Another Ministry spokesman, Vadim Perfiliev, told a news briefing in Moscow, "We note with satisfaction that the American electorate express their view with regard to the continuation of arms control negotiations and for expanding cooperation between the U.S.A. and the Soviets in all possible areas."

In China, where Bush had served as U.S. ambassador, the official news agency said the president-elect "boasts a rich experience in public service unmatched by most of his predecessors." The Foreign Ministry cabled "our warm congratulations" and hoped Bush would help U.S.-Chinese

INSIDE COLUMN

Dirty election comes to an end -- finally

It's finally over. The dirtiest Presidential election in ages is history. President-elect George Bush will become the 41st President of the United States in January, Dan Quayle will become Vice President, and Michael Dukakis will return to the Governorship of Massachusetts, which he has been neglecting since the beginning of the campaign.

And what has changed? Nothing. George Bush, whom I still believe to be the best man for the job (well, at least among those running), has become a near-clone of President Ronald Reagan. Eight years ago Bush proclaimed supply-side economics "voodoo." Now he embraces it wholeheartedly.

Bush has taken some issue stances which slightly differ from Reagan's. Bush endorses "some alteration" in the $3.35 minimum wage, which Congress wishes to raise by over 75 percent. However, this and other differences are minor.

Congress, too, was changed very little by Tuesday's election. The political make-up of both houses of Congress is not likely to change substantially. The Democrats will still maintain an overwhelming majority in the House of Representatives and a smaller, yet still decisive, majority in the Senate.

Speaker of the House Jim Wright will continue to lead Congressional Democrats on a collision course with the Republican White House. Wright is currently under investigation by the (Democratically controlled) Ethics Committee, but it is almost certain that the members of this committee will not bring charges against the leader of their party's Congressional delegation.

Indeed, the only substantial change likely to take place when the 101st Congress convenes will be in the Senate. Majority Leader Robert Byrd (D-WV) is stepping down from his leadership position. However, the two leading candidates for his position both are likely to continue with the agenda Byrd established during his tenure.

The Republican Party has become almost a permanent minority party in Congress. With the many advantages an incumbent holds, it is extremely unlikely that the GOP will be able to gain control of either house for many years.

The Democrats have had an equally bad time in their recent attempts at the presidency. The Republican candidate has won five of the past six elections. The Democratic Party has had a consistently bad time finding candidates who can win.

Matt Gallagher

Assistant News Editor

Democratic presidential candidates have been plagued with poor campaign organizations and divisiveness within their own party. One only need look at the pre-convention fights between Dukakis and Jesse Jackson to see this is true.

It seems logical to conclude from this that the United States will be stuck with a split government for the rest of the 20th Century.

The Republicans will continue to keep their lock on the presidency, while the Democrats will hold their majorities in the Congress.

What this means to Americans is that they can expect more of the bitter fighting between the Congress and the White House and between the two parties when election time rolls around.

The media has been quick to point out that the election of 1988 was the dirtiest and most issue-less of recent history.

I'm sorry to say it, but you'd better get used to it. When campaigns are won or lost by 15 second sound-bites on the evening news, the only message the candidates have time to get across are the content-less, issue-less ones to we have become accustomed. Until the means of communication change between the candidates and the voters, the messages of the candidates won't change, either.

Bayh heads off Republican sweep

Associated Press

INDIANAPOLIS-- Democratic Governor-elect Evan Bayh pledged Wednesday to work with Republican legislative leaders while the GOP pondered how to rebuild and who should succeed newly elected Vice President Dan Quayle in the U.S. Senate.

Bayh brought to an end 20 years of Republican control of the governor's office with his victory over GOP Lt. Gov. John Mutz.

At the same time, the GOP celebrated Quayle's success with President-elect George Bush, Sen. Richard Lugar's record-breaking victory, continued control of the Indiana Senate and victories in the attorney general and school superintendent races.

Indiana voters also approved a lottery referendum and gave a 10-year term to Chief Justice Randall Shepard, the target of charges by another Supreme Court justice in recent weeks.

Despite the GOP successes, dropping the governor's race was "a grievous loss in the statewide organization," according to Lugar.

Lugar said Hoosier Republicans face the dual challenge of restoring stability in the party after the Mutz loss and overcoming the financial drain of the race. The two gubernatorial candidates and the two major parties spent as much as $8 million on the race, political experts estimated.

"We had a good run. We'll just wait four years and try to start another string," said state GOP chairman Gordon Durnil.

Bayh said he's ready to patch things up with the Republicans and work together in the legislative session that begins in Jan. 9.

"I think men and women of good will can work together, can look to the future instead of reliving the past," said Bayh. "I want to be the best governor I can-- not just for the people who voted for me . . . but for the people who voted for my opponent as well," he said.

With 99 percent of Indiana's 4,900 precincts reporting, Bayh had 1,124,501 votes, or 53 percent, to 995,012, or 47 percent, for Mutz.

Bayh, who will become the nation's youngest governor on Jan. 9, met with outgoing GOP Gov. Robert Orr to plot the transition of power. Orr, at 70, is the nation's second oldest governor.

Before he leaves office, Orr will appoint someone to fill Quayle's Senate seat. The governor gave no indication whom he will appoint or when he will make an announcement.

Among those mentioned as possible choices are Mutz; former Environmental Protection Agency head William Ruckelshaus; 4th District U.S. Rep. Dan Coats; Paul Manweiler of Indianapolis; Indiana House Ways and Means Chairman Patrick Kiely of Anderson and Marilyn Quayle, the wife of the newly elected vice president.

Orr's appointee could serve until 1990 when a special election will be held to choose someone to finish the remainder Quayle's term, which expires in 1992.

Quayle anxious to begin transition

Associated Press

WASHINGTON-- Dan Quayle commenced his transition to the vice presidency Wednesday, promising to "get organized" quickly but refusing to say when he will resign his Senate seat.

Quayle said he had no specific timetable for making staff appointments and said his tour of transition headquarters near the White House was aimed at "assembling thoughts, conversing with people, nothing specific."

"When we have specific things, believe me, you'll be the first to know," the senator said, a day after he and Vice President George Bush catapulted to victory over the Democratic ticket of Michael Dukakis and Lloyd Bentsen.

Quayle, trying to keep a low profile with Bush en route back to Washington, visited briefly with reporters in the driveway of his home in suburban McLean, Va. "Am I going to have to do this every day?" he asked.

As he arrived at the transition office, Quayle said his first order of business was to "get organized." Asked whether that would be difficult, he said, "A cinch."

Quayle was being reunited with Bush at an afternoon celebration at Andrews Air Force Base in Maryland. The pair was scheduled to meet later with President Reagan at the White House.

Quayle refused to say when he would officially notify Indiana Gov. Robert Orr of his resignation from the Senate.

He has signaled several times in recent days that he would submit his resignation before Orr's term ends in January so that the Republican governor, rather than Democratic Gov.-elect Evan Bayh, can appoint someone to fill the Senate seat.

There has been widespread speculation that Quayle's wife, Marilyn, a lawyer and housewife, is among those under consideration to take the seat. Among other names mentioned in Indiana Republican political circles are Rep. Dan Coats and Indianapolis Mayor William Hudnut, and possibly Lt. Gov. John Mutz, who lost to Bayh on Tuesday.

The Quayles have sought to minimize speculation that Mrs. Quayle is interested in succeeding her husband.

As she arrived at the steps of the four-story, white-brick townhouse used for the transition headquarters, Mrs. Quayle was asked if she was interested in the seat.

"You'll have to ask the governor," she replied. "That's an answer I'll give him. You'll be the second to know."

Something worth studying.

Kelly made new director of Alcohol and Drug office

By SEAN HICKEY
Staff Reporter

The Office of Student Affairs has appointed a new director of alcohol and drug education, filling the spot left vacant since the summer.

Carolyn Kelly, former executive director of St. Joseph County's Mental Health Association, was chosen to fill the office left empty since David Dannison's resignation before this school year.

"Under the direction of Carolyn Kelly and with the efforts and energy of the other people at the University in this area, the work of the Office of Alcohol and Drug Education will move to heighten awareness and help students make choices for healthy living," said Ann Firth, director of residence life.

"Carolyn Kelly possesses outstanding administrative ability," Firth said. "She has much experience with starting programs and knows how to work with people and motivate them toward goals."

Kelly, whose two sons graduated from the University in 1985 and 1987, said she is optimistic about her job.

"I'm very optimistic because Notre Dame enjoys a very bright student body that cares a lot about each other," she said, adding that the alcohol issue is a serious national issue, warranting attention from even presidential platforms.

"Nationally, university students are turning to alcohol more consistently than is in their best interest-- both in the short run and in the long run," Kelly said.

"Students should know about the physiological effects. No one wants to see patterns develop that stand in the way of students realizing their potential in the long term," she said.

The Office of Alcohol and Drug Education was formed in February, 1988, with funds from a Department of Education grant. Grant investigators were Firth, Sally Coleman of the University Counseling Center and Christine Conway, staff psychologist at the University Counseling Center.

"I see the role of the office to marshal resources as well as initiate ideas from the tremendous creativity of the students, faculty and staff," Kelly said, adding the role is also to "marshal to the whole Notre Dame community the goal of heightening awareness and challenging students to find positive solutions to life stresses."

Crime of the Week

The Crime of the Week is the assault of a Dillon Hall resident on the night of Oct. 22, 1988 after the Air Force football game.

At about 8:45 p.m., as the victim passed two male subjects and a female in the first floor hallway, one subject asked what the victim said to the female. The subject then struck the victim in the face. The second subject struck the victim twice in the face, breaking the victim's cheek bone. The three then fled on foot from Dillon Hall.

The first suspect is described as a male black, 19-20 years old, 6', stocky build, short hair, and wearing a gray sweat shirt. The second suspect is described as a male black, approximately 19-20 years old, 5'10", medium build, short hair, wearing a dark gray sweat-shirt. The woman who accompanied the suspects was described as a female black, 5'2", medium build, 19-20 years old.

Crime Stoppers wants to know who assaulted the student and will pay a cash reward up to $300 for information leading to the apprehension of these assailants.

If you have information about this or any crime at Notre Dame, call Crime Stoppers at 288-STOP, you don't have to give your name and you'll be eligible for a cash reward.

SMC Board offended by photograph

By MARYBETH BLAJDA
News Staff

Saint Mary's Board of Governance opened the meeting Wednesday night with a discussion of a photograph which appeared on the front page of the Observer.

The picture, which ran in the Mon., Nov. 7 issue of the Observer, showed three men in the Sorin talent show dressed as the Fat Boys, complete with "black face."

The significance of "black-faced" minstrels as a form of entertainment occurred during the latter part of the 19th century and the beginning of the 20th century, according to Antoinette Brock, president of the Student Organization for the Needs of Diversification.

These minstrels were white entertainers who painted their faces black and mimicked black music, mannerisms and heritage, Brock explained.

The entertainment was a mockery-- not a tribute to the African-American culture, she said.

Both Brock and Christy Wolfe, vice president for academic affairs at Saint Mary's, are actively involved in the Diversification Task Force and brought this issue to the board's attention.

"We feel this (photograph) didn't belong on the front page of the Observer. It's degrading and offends members of the African-American college community" said Brock.

"We have to be a little more sensitive to the issues and make more people aware of this oversight," added Wolfe. "By placing that particular picture in the Observer, the Observer staff didn't realize the impact it could have on the African-American community."

The board voted to sign their names to a letter addressing this issue which will be sent to Chris Murphy, editor-in-chief of the Observer.

In other business, questions were raised regarding students' use of campus cars. In the past, some students have abused the use of campus cars supposedly for class or college business only, said Student Body President Julie Parrish.

Parrish encouraged students to combine efforts with their professors and write a proposal so that campus cars are available to those students needing transportation for class assignments, she said.

Lottery wins by large margin

Associated Press

INDIANAPOLIS-- The winning numbers for the Indiana lottery were 62-38 --the margin by which voters approved an amendment to change the state's constitution to legalize gambling.

The totals were 1,051,586 for and 640,253 against, and the proposition lost in only five counties: Adams, Elkhart, Huntington, Kosciusko and Wabash.

But anti-lottery leaders said Wednesday that despite the strong voter mandate, they would continue their fight before the state legislature, which must approve funding.

"It certainly doesn't mean the fight is over," said James Steele, communications director of the United Methodist Church and a member of the executive committee of the Indiana Council of Churches.

"The Indiana council will be working in hand in glove to lobby the legislature to block setting up the machinery for legalized gambling," said Steele.

He said church groups would unite with Indiana Citizens Against Legalized Gambling.

"Our defeat was caused by lotto mania sweeping all over the country," said Paul Oakes, chairman of ICALG. "We do have a chance to block it because of what happened in Missouri . . . We hope we can influence the legislature to prevent it."

Oakes said it's possible the state could have paramutuel betting, but no lottery.

But while Steele and Oakes pointed to Missouri, there are no plans to dismantle the lottery there. Voters in August lifted spending restrictions that once limited how much could be spent on Missouri Lottery prizes and administrative costs.

There were never any plans to dismantle Missouri's games, although many lawmakers and lottery officials predicted the lottery would die if those restrictions were not removed.

B-1Bs grounded for safety checks

Associated Press

WASHINGTON-- The Air Force on Wednesday grounded the nation's fleet of B-1B long-range bombers for a precautionary safety inspection following a crash of one of the new planes in Texas.

The Strategic Air Command, which is responsible for land-based nuclear bomber and missile forces, said the order to suspend flying was a "normal precaution" in the wake of a major accident.

The flight suspension order will be followed within the next day or two by specific instructions to B-1B mechanics on what aircraft systems they must inspect, said Lt. Col. George Peck, a spokesman at SAC headquarters in Omaha, Neb.

Those instructions will probably reflect the suspicions of the official board of inquiry that is investigating Tuesday's crash of a B-1B near Dyess Air Force Base, Texas.

Peck said he did not know which systems would be checked and would not speculate on the cause of the crash.

"But the inspection is expected to require two to four hours per aircraft," he said. "This is a one-time special inspection."

Witnesses to Tuesday's crash have said they saw smoke and fire trailing an engine on the plane.

slightly larger than the past two years.

With a close Florida race still undecided, Democrats could count on at least 55 seats in the new Senate, a gain of at least one.

Nearly complete totals showed Bush receiving 54 percent of the popular vote to 46 percent for Dukakis, with the vice president winning by a margin of nearly 7 million ballots. Bush won 40 states and 426 electoral votes; his rival won 10 states and the District of Columbia, for 112 electoral votes.

Bush moved speedily to place his stamp on the government before flying home to Washington aboard Air Force Two. On Thursday he begins a long weekend of fishing on the Florida Atlantic coast.

In addition to Baker, Bush named Chief of Staff Craig Fuller and pollster and Senior Campaign Adviser Bob Teeter as co-directors of the transition.

Bush discussed few specifics on policy matters in a 30-minute question and answer session with reporters in Texas, although he said he would be "holding the line" on taxes.

He also said Quayle would enjoy the same "access to the papers, access to the intelligence, access to the information" that Bush has had in the No. 2 slot. Bush did not cite specific duties for Quayle, but said his vice president would meet regularly with him.

Democratic Vice presidential candidate Lloyd Bentsen flew back to Washington from Texas.

relatively small margin of four percentage points or less.

"I wasn't successful in getting my message through in the South and some parts of the West," he said. But he quickly noted that voters in those regions continue to elect Democrats to local office, and said Democratic presidential candidates need to find a way to appeal to those regions.

"I gave it my best shot. We had our good days and our not-so-good days," he said.

Dukakis was asked several times about the negative commercials aired by Bush, and about the president-elect's decision to name the architect of his campaign, James Baker III, to be the new secretary of state.

"I believe in the redemption of souls," he said.

Dukakis held his news conference after spending the morning in his statehouse office, calling successful congressional candidates to congratulate them.

Slovenly language threatens the state

Dear Editor:

In response to Evan Smyth's letter of Nov. 4 attempting to explain what is "rotten" in the current "state" of the U.S., I would suggest that Mr. Smyth's own letter reveals the biggest threat to democracy: Americans' growing inability to think and to articulate their thoughts and beliefs simply, clearly, and directly.

George Orwell, whom Smyth himself cites, explained the danger quite clearly and succinctly in his 1946 essay, "Politics and the English Language:" "The present political chaos is connected with the decay of language. The English language becomes ugly and inaccurate because our thoughts are foolish, but the slovenliness of our language makes it easier to have foolish thoughts."

I find my students' growing unfamiliarity with the meanings and nuances of their own language far more frightening than all the political rhetoric to which we have been subjected in the past months.

Clearly today's students (as evidenced as well by Smyth's own rambling and disorganized letter), are increasingly unable to speak their mind clearly and effectively because they do not have a firm grasp on their own language. Further, this difficulty in manipulating their own language makes them increasingly unwilling to invest the serious effort required in thinking for themselves, "Why bother with discussion?" a Notre Dame freshman asked me recently. "You're the teacher--you should just tell me what I need to know."

Such a passive attitude toward learning, coupled with the growing abuse of and dis-ease with the English language itself constitutes the major and most insidious threat to the democratic process. There are any number of countries in which the above-mentioned student could live where the government hires and trains teachers to do just what that student wished: to tell its citizens exactly what they are supposed to think--but such countries are not generally considered democracies. As Orwell notes, however, once the cause of such a decline is recognized, the solution is easily achieved: "If one gets rid of these (bad and lazy) habits

(in written English), one can think more clearly, and to think clearly is a necessary first step towards political regeneration."

Thus the challenge for all of us, especially while we are still students, is to embrace the opportunity to learn what we think--to formulate our own beliefs and then to articulate those beliefs clearly and succinctly. Indeed, in a democracy, the commitment to such a challenge is our primary duty as citizens. As one of my writing teachers told me: "Just say what you know, know what you mean, and mean what you say."

Snowball fight just random vandalism

Dear Editor:

This letter is addressed to the small group of Notre Dame students who felt compelled to test their strength by tossing snowballs through hundreds of windows around campus on Sunday night.

I thought that all you folks should know that each broken window will cost about ten dollars to repair. That ten dollars multiplied by the hundred or so windows will create an unnecessary expense for the University that will undoubtedly run into the thousands of dollars. I wonder how a group of students who pride themselves on their social awareness could commit such senseless acts of destruction. The Notre Dame student body should have more common sense than to take part in such childish acts of vandalism.

If students choose to take part in a good natured snowball fight, that is their prerogative. However, when the event degenerates into a pointless assault on University property, it is time to step back and evaluate the activity.

I would ask each and every person who smashed a window on Sunday night to reflect on their actions. I would ask them to think about what could have been done with the ten dollars that they senselessly wasted. And finally, I would ask them to take ten dollars out of their own pocket and contribute it to some group who will put it to constructive use. The vandalism of Sunday night is not in keeping with the Notre Dame philosophy of making the most of our resources. There is too much deprivation in the world to commit these senseless acts of waste.

Hopefully those persons who took part in the vandalism will reflect on their actions, and, if faced with a similar situation in the future, they will act with greater maturity and forethought.

Logan clients appreciate tickets

Dear Editor:

As co-presidents of the Notre Dame Saint Mary's Council for the Retarded, we would like to thank the hundreds of students, faculty, and staff members who donated their Rice game tickets last week. Because of your donations, a record number of Logan Center clients were given the opportunity to see a Notre Dame football game in person. Despite the weather, all of the clients insisted upon staying for the whole game to cheer the Irish on to victory.

To show our great appreciation to all of you, we would like to extend an invitation to this week's Saturday Recreation Period at Logan Center from 9-11:30 a.m. Please stop by at any time to give our clients a chance to personally thank you for your generosity, and to show you that the enjoyment you've given them is worth many times the ticket price. Thanks again.

Grad students pinned as cynics

Dear Editor:

I would like to respond to the Viewpoint column of Nov. 7 by Mr. Kevin Smant that described the "typical" Notre Dame graduate student. Being a graduate student myself and knowing many other grad students, I find his description both offensive and untrue. I have met many students who not only show concern about social, political, and environmental problems, but work to try to change them as well.

In my area of Civil Engineering, many of us study environmental issues and work towards their solutions. Also, we have a new program that works on the environmental problems in developing nations. As for myself, I have worked extensively with the homeless (and can therefore attest that they do exist) as well as being involved with human rights issues with Amnesty International. I am also proud to say that I was involved in the successful campaign to get my undergraduate institution to divest its interests in South Africa.

Another point of Mr. Smant's article that bothered me was when he implied that the "typical" grad student was cynical or "wears cynicism on his sleeve." I do not find this to be true among grad students I know. Although many of us do make political statements, we are at least well informed about the issues we are addressing.

Finally, I question the implication that graduate students are materialistic. If graduate students were so interested in these things, we would not have come back to school at all. Many graduates are married with young families to support and have given up a lot to be here. Most of us could be making a lot more money and have a lot more free time if we had a traditional job.

In short, I both resent these generalizations about graduate students and challenge Mr. Smant to prove his claims with substantial evidence. If this cannot be done, I would like to caution him, and others, from making such broad derogatory generalizations about a group of people as diverse as the graduate students of Notre Dame.

Modern twist to Shakespeare brightens 'Twelfth Night'

accent writer

If New Year's Eve parties were as bizarre as "Twelfth Night," more people would settle for Dick Clark, Times Square and a cozy couch. Notre Dame's Department of Communication and Theatre offered its rendition of Shakespeare's bawdy comedy last night to a very receptive audience. Traditionally portrayed in an early 17th Century setting, director Mark Pilkinton introduced an innovative twist. This version of "Twelfth Night" is set in "a Christmas costume party somewhere in the United States."

Confused identity, the key element of humor in this play, allows the characters much room to play. Since slapstick is not easy to do, the actors' performances in this comedy are skillfully accomplished through obvious hard work.

The play opens with Orsino, Duke of Illyria, portrayed by Tim Deenihan. Orsino declares his love for Countess Olivia (Kathryn Schimmel), alone with his attendants. Olivia, however, decides to bestow her love on Orsino's servant Cesario (Roberta Dvorak), who is definitely one of the play's highlights. The catch is that Cesario is actually Viola, a girl in disguise. So begins the confusion.

Olivia's household produces the most interesting characters. Sir Toby Belch and Sir Andrew Aguecheek, hilariously played by Tony Lawton and Joseph Keller, drunkenly stagger about most of the comedy, playing tricks on everyone else or performing lecherous ditties with each other. Their female cohort, Maria, was portrayed by Nancy O'Connor, who generously endowed her role with much zeal.

One of their victims, Malvolio, is performed admirably by Nick Simon, who runs the gamut of emotions throughout the play.

Although all the characters have humorous parts, Olivia's jester, played by Joseph Medel, has the most opportunity for natural comedy. Whenever Medel performed, especially with Lawton and Keller, the audience had a ball.

Accompanying the performance, pianist Matthew Grayson and flutist Laura LaVelle, provided simple, humorous themes at appropriate moments. Much of the play's anachronistic style is developed by the music, which includes the "Rocky" theme as well as the "Jeopardy" tune.

Over all, "Twelfth Night" was an entertaining, at times uproarious, comedy that should be commended not only for the performances, but for Pilkinton's innovative theme.

Metzger exposes the other side of Einstein

ROBYN SIMMONS
assistant accent editor

When people hear the name Albert Einstein, they usually think of Einstein the scientist or Einstein the genius. But how many people think of Einstein the practical bohemian?

Actor Ed Metzger brings out the lighter side of Albert Einstein in a one-man show at 8 p.m. tonight in O'Laughlin Auditorium at Saint Mary's College. "Einstein: The Practical Bohemian" explores the personal side of the man. Metzger takes a humorous look at the Nobel Prize winner, emphasizing fatherhood over physics and wit over weapons.

Metzger developed his one-man show after he left Broadway to perform in Hollywood. "I decided I wanted to do something that shows my talent in another light other than what I had been cast for," said Metzger. "I had to break away from the casting mold of always being a tough guy or a gangster in movies and television."

In the course of investigating the details surrounding Einstein's life and speaking to those who knew Einstein best, including his eldest son, "I found out that he was a fine humorist," said Metzger. Metzger first appeared as Einstein in 1978.

The show is filled with humor that stems from Einstein's character. For example, after Einstein won the Nobel Prize, he was treated to a ticker-tape parade in Manhattan where thousands of people cheered him as his limousine rode by. "He was so amazed and so stunned," said Metzger. "He turned to Jimmy Walker and said, 'I never thought so many people understood the theory of relativity.'"

Another important source of humor was Einstein's

home life. "He was more interested in how God created the universe than whether or not his sons needed diapering," said Metzger.

"It almost is a situation comedy because we are laughing at this man we all respect and know...he's an average man," he said. "There's a lot of humorous thought in that. We can associate with that; we can't associate with the Nobel Prize."

Although Einstein spent a lot of time contemplating the universe, he was also very practical. "He would never memorize history dates, never memorize a map, and he refused to memorize multiplication tables because they were in the textbook," said Metzger.

Einstein's practicality was also reflected in his dress. "He was always a very poor dresser," said Metzger. "His exact words were, 'Long hair minimizes the need for a barber, and when you wear shoes, socks can be done without. They only produce holes.'" Dressed in shabby attire, Metzger bears a close resemblance to Einstein. "I found that I look close to the man without the extensive makeup," he said.

Touring as Einstein has made Metzger somewhat of an authority on Einstein the man. After one performance for a group of distinguished scientists, Metzger answered their questions about Einstein. "They wanted to know about the man's sex life."

"Einstein: The Practical Bohemian" answers many of the personal questions that people have about Einstein, who was referred to as the "Jewish cosmic comedian" by his family. According to Metzger, the performance will give the audience a feel for "the humor of the man and the humanity of the man."

"He was a very special human being in this world," said Metzger. "Therefore, a man like Einstein who had a great sense of morality is on a pedestal (and) does stand out among the others."

Stonebreaker named finalist for '88 Butkus

Associated Press

ORLANDO, Fla. (AP) - Mike Stonebreaker of No. 1-ranked Notre Dame was named Wednesday as one of the five finalists for the fourth annual Butkus Award, presented by the Downtown Athletic Club of Orlando to the top linebacker in the country.

The other four finalists are Keith DeLong of Tennessee, Percy Snow of Michigan State, Broderick Thomas of Nebraska and Derrick Thomas of Alabama. The Thomases are not related.

The 12-man selection committee will elect the winner on Nov. 29. The Butkus Award will be formally presented at a dinner on Dec. 3.

Oklahoma's Brian Bosworth won the award in 1985 and 1986 and Florida State's Paul McGowan won it last year.

Irish junior linebacker Michael Stonebreaker was named one of five finalists for the Butkus Award on Wednesday. The award is given to the top linebacker in college football.

us in a better position to win the football game is the guy we'll put in there."

The Irish had two kicks blocked by Rice last week, a field goal and an extra point, the latter having been run back for two points by Rice outside linebacker Bill Stone.

"After looking over the films," said Holtz, "we saw that on the extra point, the tee was too close to the line of scrimmage. Granted, we didn't block very effectively, but the tee was at least a yard too close to the line."

A prediction about a seldom if ever heard from player from Lou Holtz:

"I've been around a long time and I'm not wrong very often about personnel. I'll tell you right now that George Poorman is going to be the shock of his (freshman) class. He is really something."

Poorman, a quarterback-defensive back out of Palatine, Ill., has yet to play a down this season.

More Holtz, waxing philosophical:

"Even though the season starts to get long about now, sooner or later the players will realize that the journey is more fun than the destination. They don't realize that now, but they will. The fun of the game is getting to where you want to be."

"For all of the young players," said Schafer, in his second year as Irish mentor, "these first eight games have been quite an awakening to the world of college hockey. But David especially has made tremendous improvement over his time with us."

"He's an extremely gifted playmaker who is very offensive-minded. And I don't mind that a bit because we're not going to be scoring the amount of goals we did last year as a result of our schedule. It's a real plus to have a freshman come right in and contribute like Dave has."

Bankoske and the Irish will have their hands full this weekend against a Falcon squad who will probably be looking to exact revenge on Notre Dame.

Last year's series between the two teams at Notre Dame provided the most exciting and dramatic matchups of the year for the Irish. Notre Dame won both in tense come-from-behind efforts to the cheers of the season's largest home crowds. Schafer expects more of the same.

"One difference this weekend," said Schafer, "will be the high altitudes we'll be playing in up in the Rockies. We're talking about short, short 30-second shifts and then back to the bench. But otherwise we'll prepare just like we would against any other team. They're all tough this year."

"Lately, we've gotten our goals-against average down to about where it should be, but defense is still our top priority in practice. We've got to give (goalie) Lance Madson more help than we are. I'm glad he's on our side. He's made a lot of defensive breakdowns look a lot worse than they could have."

Both games in Colorado Springs will be at 7:30. The Irish return home next Friday for the first leg of a series with Lake Forest.

Senior linebacker sets tempo for Irish defense

Pritchett 'an ND man'

By PETE LaFLEUR
Sports Writer

For average Notre Dame fans, fifth-year senior linebacker Wes Pritchett represents the intensity and physical play needed to play his position.

But there are many sides to Pritchett, whom Irish head coach Lou Holtz calls "a Notre Dame man in every respect," that many fans may never see.

Many may never see the National Merit Scholarship semi finalist recite Shakespeare as he did at the team's talent show. Many may never see him playing golf or badminton. And many may never witness his sense of humor that Irish coaches say helps loosen up the team during practice.

But what they can see in every game is Pritchett's intensity.

It is an intensity that has propelled him to a team-leading 95 tackles, which ties him with Michael Stonebreaker.

It is an intensity which can be best seen in the Miami game, where Pritchett broke a bone in his left hand during the first quarter but stayed in the game without missing a play.

"I knew that my hand was sore, but my adrenalin was flowing so much that it didn't even phase me," said Pritchett. "But then I realized that I had broken the bone and I could hear crunching when I made a fist."

Pritchett then had a trainer tape two of his fingers together during a timeout and returned to the field.

"That was probably the biggest game since I've been here and it was going to take more than that to keep me off the field," he said.

Pritchett went on to lead the Irish with 15 tackles and also broke up several crucial Miami pass attempts. According to Irish defensive coordinator Barry Alvarez, such a performance was indicative of Pritchett's ability to set the tempo.

"Wes knew the magnitude of the game and he wasn't going to miss it because of a broken hand," Alvarez said. "He didn't even miss a snap although he knew it was broken. That's just the kind of player he is."

The native of Atlanta, Ga., said he developed his intensity at a very young age.

Former Chicago Bears linebacker Dick Butkus and Pritchett's father, a former player at the University of Georgia, were both important influences on Pritchett's style of play.

"I liked Dick Butkus because he was the meanest and nastiest football player of all time," said Pritchett. "I guess I just respected that and wanted to be mean and tough like him when I was seven and out playing in the backyard. And for me the game is the same as when I was playing it as a kid."

"My dad really loved football, and because of him I really learned to love the game," Pritchett continued. "He was from the 'old school' way—hard and tough. That's how I've always felt football should be played."

Nonetheless, Pritchett's elementary and high school days at Westminster were characterized by more than just intense football. Pritchett was a four-time varsity golf player, though most people would sooner envision the 6'6, 250 lb. linebacker twisting a golf club around a quarter-back's neck than strolling down a fairway.

Because of the way the Irish defense is designed, Pritchett's accomplishments are often overlooked. Pritchett plays at the "Mike" linebacker spot, which must always take on at least one blocker. The "Eagle" linebacker, meanwhile, has much more freedom and can make tackles with greater ease.

"Based on the scheme of our defense, the Eagle linebacker is always going to have a lot of tackles," said Alvarez. "But to have a Mike linebacker (Pritchett) leading the team is unlikely and a tribute to Wes."

The spirit and intensity with which Pritchett plays is adequately linked to his decision to attend Notre Dame and stay for a fifth year. Pritchett cited what he believes Notre Dame stands for—"integrity, honesty, and great football"—as the motivating factors to his decisions.

"I think Notre Dame is a special place and I didn't realize until I got here how fanatical the fans are and how unique the spirit is," Pritchett said. "I'm glad to have been a part of it because it's something I'll take with me for the rest of my life."

questions.

This is Kentucky. Although a 38th Southeastern Conference championship would seem a lofty goal, Sutton feels there is enough talent to make for an interesting year.

Of course, Kentucky has a chance of winning the conference title. Would that really be news, in light of the fact the 'Cats have won the SEC more than two-thirds of the time since 1933? Besides, the SEC is down anyway this year.

As for the talent, Kentucky would have even more of it this year if Michiana's own Shawn Kemp had not lost his freshman season of eligibility to Bylaw 5-1-j.

But now the Kemp saga has taken another turn. Kemp, fresh out of Elkhart is now fresh out of the University of Kentucky. He left the University after being accused of pawing some gold chains. Nothing wrong with that, except those chains happened to belong to Sean Sutton, a member of the Wildcats and the son of the Kentucky coach.

Kemp now is the biggest name on the Trinity Valley (Tex.) Community College roster.

This is Kentucky.

"I'm not looking to throw a party for Kentucky, but that is how I feel. I think it's an honest appraisal because I've seen all the programs, touching them as a coach, a player and as an NBC broadcast commentator. . . I have touched all the so-called capitals of basketball, but when it gets down to the short stroke the only true capital of basketball is Lexington."

-Al McGuire

This is Kentucky? Maybe to some people, but I prefer the statement Indiana coach Bob Knight was quoted as saying in A Season on the Brink. His Hoosiers were about to face the Kenny Walker-led Wildcats. The NCAA had ruled Indiana star Steve Alford ineligible for the game because he had posed fully clothed for a sorority's charity calendar.

"For Alford not to play when all their kids are playing kills me. There are kids on that team right now who have gotten more crap from alumni than any players in the country. I suppose Kenny Walker's never gotten anything. Anyone who believes that is either stupid or blind."

-Bob Knight

Now that is Kentucky.

Top recruits choose ND

Special to The Observer

Wednesday the Notre Dame women's basketball team reeled in two of the nation's best catches as 6'3 forward Dionne Smith and point guard Coquese Washington signed national letters of intent to attend Notre Dame.

Smith, from North Central High School in Indianapolis, Ind., averaged 12.6 points and 10.3 rebounds last year as a junior and comes into her senior year as one of the most highly touted recruits in the country.

Blue-Star scouting service ranks Smith as the 36th best women's basketball player in the nation and the 12th best forward.

Smith, who had narrowed her choices down to Penn State, Illinois and Notre Dame, was also picked as an honorable mention All-America in Street & Smith magazine.

"We're very excited about signing Dionne," said Irish head coach Muffet McGraw. "She's really going to help us run and press. She's an up-tempo player and good defensive player."

"Initially, she'll help our defense and rebounding and eventually she'll be a good scorer. Dionne's a great athlete with a lot of potential."

Washington, a playmaker from Flint, Mich., had placed Georgetown and Notre Dame at the top of a long list of schools vying for her talents, but decided early on that she would attend Notre Dame and cancelled the rest of her recruiting visits.

"She is very quick and can really score," said Graduate Assistant Sandy Botham. "She's averaging about 23 points per game right now and really makes things happen out there."

"She plays a lot like (sophomore point guard) Karen Robinson, so we're all very excited about her signing."

Senior captain Heidi Bunek enthusiastically welcomed the new arrivals as well:

"Both players are going to help build up our program," said Bunek. "Every year we've been improving the quality of the team and adding two top players like Dionne and Coquese, we can't help but get better."

"Next year Dionne will give us added strength and height and Coquese will help give us even more speed."

Veteran Belles squad starts preseason basketball drills

By JANE SHEA

Saint Mary's Sports Editor

The Saint Mary's basketball team's season appears very promising for 1988-89 with the return of seven players from last season and the guidance of Head Coach Marvin Wood.

The Belles have a strong returning nucleus as well as some new players that will add new depth to the team. Kathy Restovich from Minnesota was all-state in high school and turned down an offer to play at the University of Minnesota to attend Saint Mary's.

Senior Jennifer Harte returns as center for her fourth and final year. Laura Danch and Lisa McGrath are also back for their last season which will provide leadership.

On offense, Coach Wood

plans to use the fast-break to keep the team running. On defense, he plans to have a tight man-to-man.

"I am very optimistic about the season," said Wood. "The attitude at practice has been super."

Junior Dawn Brohman is playing on the team for the first time after having a solid high school career. Two other juniors, Julie Radke and Anne Gallagher, who played last season, will also contribute to the team's strong base.

"I look for improvement as the season continues," said Wood, "We are playing against some tough Division I and II schools."

The Belles will scrimmage Nazareth College and Glen Oaks Friday and Saturday, respectively, at home.

Bankoske springs into action

Irish hockey faces Air Force in two-game series

The 3-4-1 Notre Dame hockey team heads west to Colorado Springs, Colo., this weekend for a pair of games with the Air Force Falcons.

And through eight games, the leading scorer for the Irish is, well, a bit of a surprise.

Freshman David Bankoske, listed preseason as a right wing who would be fighting for playing time on one of the lower lines, has quickly vaulted to the first line amidst the likes of co-captain Matt Hanzel and the team's returning high-point man, Tim Kuehl.

"Yeah, it's been kind of a whirlwind since I've gotten here," said the 5-10, 175-pound

phenom out of Williamsville, N.Y. "I've felt very comfortable so far with the team. But it sure helped having someone to break me in to the way things were going to work down here."

Bankoske is referring to older brother Rob, a senior right wing who has made David's transition to college hockey smoother than most.

"Rob brought me right into the weight room the first day," said Bankoske, "and introduced me to everybody. We joked around and got to know each other. I haven't had a problem since."

Bankoske's nine points (two goals, seven assists) are testament to that statement. And ironically, the Bankoske brothers are the only Irish regulars who have yet to register a penalty minute. Irish head coach Ric Schafer knows he has a find in David.

On the 10th week, the Irish rested

The off week.

Some teams have several. Some teams have one or two of them choicely placed before tougher games in their schedules. Some teams have several placed choicely throughout their schedules.

Lou Holtz would rather not have any.

Pete Skiko

Football Notebook

"Right now, we're playing pretty well, and I would just as soon suit up this weekend," said the Irish head coach. "But of course, we can't control that. It just gives us more time to prepare for Penn State next Saturday."

Holtz may also be hearkening back to last year's 30-22 debacle at Pittsburgh, which was also after an off week. During that week, the then-fourth ranked Irish made some changes in personnel that may have cost them. Is Holtz planning more changes this year?

"This year's squad is certainly a great deal different from last year's," said Holtz. "For the most part, we're healthy. We're not interested in making any changes. What we are interested in is improving as a team every day and being the best team on the football field on Nov. 19. We'll probably go light (in practice Thursday) and then we'll give the players Friday, Saturday, and Sunday off. Of course, that's always subject to change."

There has been a lot of talk swirling about Ricky Watters and his status on the offense. Holtz downplays the hubbub and is standing behind the team's second-leading all-purpose yardage gainer.

"We really don't like to place people into designated spots—first-string or second-string," said Holtz, "but right now Ricky is playing behind Tony (Brooks) and Mark (Green) at tailback. He has the potential to be a great ballplayer, but he has to straighten himself out first. But by no means are we going to phase a player like Ricky Watters out of our offensive scheme."

"When Ricky fumbled the punt (last week vs. Rice) and came over to the sidelines, I didn't say a word to him. There comes a time when nothing needs to be said. All I look for is a sense of responsibility to the team, and I see that in Ricky. I try not to get all over my players on the sidelines when they have the right attitude."

Holtz, on the kicking game:

"You know, kickers are like golfers. One day they'll go out and shoot the lights out, and the next day they can't score for anything. We just go from week to week with our kickers. As with everybody else on the team, whoever puts

UK basketball promoters only fooling themselves

"My genuine opinion of the Kentucky basketball program is that there is only one and it is top drawer, Park Avenue, and that all other basketball programs in the country think they are, but they are not."

—Al McGuire

Those words must come as music to the ears of anyone involved with the Kentucky basketball program. Basketball fans near the Lexington campus just haven't received much good news at all since their favorite team's season ended last March with a loss to Villanova in the NCAA Southeast Regional semifinals.

Since then, the 'Cats have been hit with major losses in talent and respect. Numerous allegations of recruiting violations make it look as if major NCAA penalties are on the horizon. And with only one senior and one junior on this year's Kentucky team, some experts are forecasting the Wildcats to finish somewhere in the middle of the Southeastern Conference—a league Kentucky used to dominate.

But you'd never tell this from looking at the 1988-89 Kentucky basketball press guide. The book's cover is entirely white—white basketball shoes, white shorts, a white hoop, a white whistle, white socks, a white tank top, a white clipboard and to top it off, a white basketball. You'd think it was previewing a wedding rather than one of the most penalized teams in NCAA history.

I'd like to think you can't judge a book by its cover. Unfortunately, several excerpts from this media guide prove that's just not the case. The press guide uses the theme "This is Kentucky," in describing one of the most successful collegiate basketball programs in history. But recent charges have given Kentucky an entirely new look.

Steve Megargee

Assistant Sports Editor

Take these examples, for instance:
(Assistant coach Dwane) Casey made a (sic) immediate impact on the Wildcat program, joining with head coach Eddie Sutton and assistant coach James Dickey in landing what most publications regard the best recruiting crop in the country the past two years.

The NCAA has charged Casey with sending Emery air freight packages to the home of Kentucky recruit Chris Mills' family. The packages contained $1,000 in cash.

In a recent issue, Sports Illustrated reported that the mother of Kentucky recruit Shawn Kemp (more about him later) was the recipient of quite a few Emery packages while Kemp was being pursued by schools like Kentucky, Indiana and Nevada-Las Vegas.

In the same Sports Illustrated article, it was reported that Kemp's mother made "unusual payments in cash" right around the time she received the packages.

This is Kentucky.

"I believe Eric Manuel is one of the top young players in the country and certainly, at this stage, one of the top young players I've ever had the opportunity to coach. If we are going to be successful, I think a large part of it will be due to the type of season Eric has."

—Kentucky head coach Eddie Sutton

In the wake of questions about his entrance exam results, Manuel has taken himself off the Kentucky basketball team for the time being.

To avoid falling victim to Bylaw 5-1-j (Proposition 48), one must score a 700 on the SAT or a 15 on the ACT. Manuel scored less than 700 on two attempts at the SAT. He then made a drastic improvement by recording a 23 on the ACT.

A United Press International report showed that the student sitting next to Manuel had the exact same answers as Manuel on the 100-question multiple choice exam, with the exception of just eight
