South African miners stage one-day walkout

Associated Press

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa — As many as 325,000 black miners — more than half the workforce — stayed off the job Wednesday in what union officials called a powerful display of worker strength in South Africa's largest industry.

The one-day walkout, called to protest the 177 deaths in a Sept. 16 fire at the Kinross Gold Mine, cost the mines an estimated $3.6 million, according to an academic monitoring group.

"This worker action is unparalleled in South African labor history and demonstrates the importance of worker safety at the work place," said Marcel Golding, spokesman for the 250,000-member National Union of Mineworkers.

"The whole theme was that this was an accident which could have been prevented," Golding said of the deadly fire, the nation's worst gold mining accident.

Fumes from burning materials, including a polyurethane foam used to line the tunnels but banned in American and British mines, are suspected in the deaths of the 172 black and five white miners.

The miners' union said 325,000 of the nation's 600,000 black miners did not go to work. Mining companies put the figure at about 250,000.

Most mines said they would dock the strikers' pay or take a vacation day from them.

Jay Naidoo, general secretary of the Congress of South African Trade Unions, said about 275,000 workers in other industries held memorial services, including hour-long stoppages.

"This shows the extent to which the miners' union is representative of the miners, and the support it is able to muster," Naidoo said. "It also demonstrated that health and safety have also become an issue."

The Chamber of Mines, the industry association, had called for five minutes of silence at noon, in 100 gold and coal mines nationwide. The union said that was not adequate.

Mining companies refused to estimate the cost of the protest. The Labor Monitoring Group based at the University of the Witwatersrand estimated the cost at $3.6 million, based on its count that 250,000 to 275,000 miners stayed away from work.

Students' awareness of rights tops Judicial Council agenda

By BUD LUEPKE

The Judicial Council is working toward greater student awareness of their rights and options regarding University violations, according to the council's second meeting of the year held last night.

Judicial Coordinator Maria Cintron said the general meeting was called to hear the various committee reports. "We wanted to check to see how everything is going, to touch base. Most of the work is going on in the committees," Cintron said.

A letter requesting legal aid at cut rates with alcohol violations or misdemeanors will be sent to over a hundred lawyers. The Legal Services Committee which is preparing the letter, said a similar letter prepared last year received only two responses, but that this year's letter would be reworded.

The Judicial Council also voted unanimously for the publication of 3000 new students' rights pamphlets. The pamphlet will be a brief du Lac abstract devoted exclusively to students' rights and penalties concerning rooms, possession of cars and academic dishonesty. Cintron reported that the cost of publication would be $800.

The Committee on Rector Relations discussed plans for a meeting for new rectors with veteran rectors. Experienced rectors would offer the new rectors ideas for fitting a judicial board to their dorms, the committee chairman said.

The Publicity Committee said it would soon publish ads to let students know more about their judicial board's activities as well as Judicial Council business.

Cintron said she will send a letter to all resident assistants. The letter, said Cintron, will encourage them to refer students who are in trouble with the University to her. Cintron said she can advise students on the best course of action and prepare them before they meet with the Office of Student Affairs.

The Judicial Council is composed of the judicial board chairmen from each hall and one off-campus member.

South African minister threatens to curtail purchases of U.S. grain

Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The South African foreign minister warned two U.S. farm state senators his country would immediately end purchases of U.S. grain if the Senate overrides President Reagan's veto of economic sanctions against South Africa, Sen. Richard Lugar said Wednesday night.

Lugar, R-Ind., called the action by Foreign Minister Pik Botha "despicable" and an unacceptable intrusion into Senate business that amounts to "bribery and intimidation."

Lugar, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said the two senators — Edward Zorinsky, D-Neb., and Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, — were called to the telephone in the Senate Republican cloakroom by Sen. Jesse Helms, R-N.C., a strong opponent of the sanctions.

According to Lugar, Zorinsky said the South African foreign minister told him that "the moment that you override President Reagan's veto, South Africa will immediately ban U.S. grain imports. ..."

Lugar said Botha also declared that South Africa would react to the override of the veto by barring from its ports U.S. grain shipments bound for the so-called frontline black African nations, some of which are landlocked and all of which are largely dependent on South Africa for transportation facilities.

"I believe that all Americans, and especially American farmers, will condemn foreign bribery and intimidation to change the votes of the U.S. senate," Lugar said.

He said South Africa has turned to the American grain market and increased purchases of U.S. grain in the aftermath of sanctions imposed by Canada and Australia, which also are major grain exporters.

"We are being bribed because others have had moral courage and done what they should have done," Lugar said.

Lugar said he believes the White House lacks the votes needed to sustain the Reagan veto and said, "I feel confident the veto will be overridden."

The Senate, which was to vote on whether to override the veto

Thursday afternoon, opened a four-hour debate on the issue as Senate Majority Leader Bob Dole, R-Kan., said senators might legitimately consider the possible adverse impact of sanctions on their states.

Dole said the South Africans have in the past bought "substantial quantities" of wheat and corn. "I do believe that makes the point ... that there may be some consequences some people in our states, farmers, may have to contend with."

Helms said sanctions will "shoot the American farmer in the foot." And he confirmed that "Pik Botha called me and several other senators and said, 'We will have to announce we will cease to purchase U.S. grain if the president's veto is overridden.'"

Sen. Nancy Kassebaum, R-Kan., said Pik Botha also told senators that South Africa will purchase more U.S. wheat if the veto is sustained.

Earlier in the day, Reagan lobbied senators by telephone in a final push to preserve his veto of sanctions aimed at pressuring the South African government to abandon the system of apartheid.

Crime, not student parties, tops neighborhood problems

The South Bend Tribune printed an editorial Tuesday concerning underage Notre Dame students and Indiana's 21 drinking law which I feel was rather hypocritical. I won't even get into arguments against the current naive and inflexible conservative American attitude which is the root of such impractical laws eliminating the rights of adults age 18 to 20 to consume alcohol. The law's poor success in curbing alcohol abuse and consumption among people under 21 speaks for itself.

No, what really bothers me about the editorial titled "N.D. and drinking" is its argument that off-campus drinking parties are a genuine nuisance to residents of the northeast neighborhood. That is undoubtedly true; I'm not trying to persuade anyone that noise until dawn and beer cans littering his yard the following morning is desirable.

No, what bothers me is specifically this paragraph: The South Bend Police Department and state excise police are following a much sterner policy (about cracking down on student parties in the northeast neighborhood) this year. Students should try to understand that this approach is a response to citizen complaints. Police are paid to protect those citizens. That protection includes doing something about unacceptable noise, unruly behavior, littering and even public urination. Few of those complaining would wish this problem visited on their own families.

Yeah, and I'd bet few of those students complaining also have families who rob their neighbors.

I'm so glad the South Bend Tribune is worried about protecting those citizens of the northeast neighborhood from us dastardly students. I mean, if those citizens weren't able to get their eight hours sleep, they might not be alert enough to steal our stereos, jewelry and kitchen appliances from our rented houses. Remember, the Tribune says "Police are paid to protect those citizens." Paid from what? The gains of illegally acquired goods?

I realize it's not fair to generalize. Not every resident of the northeast neighborhood is a thief. Just some of them.

South Bend residents might be more upset over student parties than about the rampant crime in the area because students are transient. Maybe students don't pay city property taxes (although those who hold jobs pay income taxes), but the large economic support base the University provides South Bend more than compensates for that point. I doubt anyone would argue that students should be denied police protection because they are not permanent residents of the area, but it sure seems the South Bend Tribune believes crime is not as serious a problem as student parties. Otherwise they would have printed an editorial that might have said something like this:

Mary Jacoby
 Accent Editor

Citizens should try to understand that this (police crackdown on crime in the northeast neighborhood) is a response to student complaints. Police are paid to protect those students. That protection includes doing something about unacceptable crime, frequent breaking and entering into private residences, rocks thrown through windows, vandalism to student cars and even public flaunting of stolen goods. Few of those complaining would wish this problem on their own families.

Numerous students in the northeast neighborhood have been victims of crime. One house of students reported $7,000 worth of jewelry and other items stolen. They also said one of the thieves returned later with a piece of their jewelry and tried to sell it back to them. I, personally, have had a trunk I left in a friend's basement over the summer completely ransacked by burglars. The house I left it in has rocks thrown through its windows regularly.

Admittedly, parties and their aftermath are disturbing nuisances to the families who live near students. Ideally, students should keep the volume on their stereos down and make sure everyone is inside for a party instead of loitering on the street. But the crime in the area is just as bad, and losing a special gold bracelet or a hard-earned stereo is a terrible thing.

To the South Bend Tribune, I say there are two sides to an issue which they seem to consider cut-and-dried.

Daniloff cites Reagan's concern as key to release and homecoming

Associated Press

WASHINGTON - Nicholas Daniloff told President Reagan Wednesday that if it hadn't been for Reagan's "very deep and personal interest" in his case, he probably would have been kept in the Soviet Union for years.

Reporter Daniloff, spending his first full day in the United States, met briefly with Reagan at the White House before the two made a joint appearance in the Rose Garden. They were joined there by Nancy Reagan, who stood next to the reporter, and Daniloff's wife, Ruth, and Daniloff's children, Miranda, 23, and Caleb, 16.

Reagan defended the arrangement with the Soviets that led to Daniloff's freedom, saying: "I don't think there's caving in at all." Daniloff had been arrested Aug. 30 by the KGB and charged with spying in the Soviet Union.

Asked whether U.S.-Soviet relations are back on track with Daniloff's release, the president said, "We'll find out in about 10 days." That was a reference to the planned meeting in Iceland Oct. 11-12 between Reagan and Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev.

The meeting, described as preliminary discussions to a formal summit, was part of the deal ending in Daniloff's release.

Daniloff, 51, praised Reagan for his involvement in the case.

"This is a very complex situation and if it hadn't been for President Reagan taking a very deep and personal interest in my case it would probably be some years before I could stand in front of you and say, 'Thank you, Mr President'."

Earlier, Daniloff was given a warm welcome by co-workers in the lobby atrium at U.S. News & World Report. He said he was pleased with the "mini-summit" between the superpower leaders in Iceland, and wanted to cover it.

"I'm awfully, awfully moved," Daniloff said after the rousing welcome from colleagues who clapped, cheered and extended their hands. "I didn't know so many people worked here."

Daniloff said he would thank Reagan and the American officials "who, I think, turned themselves inside out" to secure his freedom. He was arrested in Moscow Aug. 30 on espionage charges, which the administration said were phony.

The principal lesson Daniloff said he learned from his experience was that the American system emphasizes the preciousness and the dignity of a single individual.

The journalist arrived in the United States Tuesday, a day after Washington and Moscow worked out a multi-part deal that included a Reagan-Gorbachev meeting in Iceland Oct. 11-12.

The arrangement also called for the release of accused spy Gennadiy Zakharov to the Soviets. Zakharov, a Soviet employee at the United Nations, flew back to Moscow after he pleaded no contest to espionage charges.

Clarification

A quote by Lisa Lawler in yesterday's Saint Mary's Programming Board article was unclear. She said that under the proposed revision of parietals at Saint Mary's, it would be the student's responsibility, based on an honor system, to see that men are out of the dorms. It would not be the resident assistants' responsibility. Lawler said, "It (the parietals honor system) works at Notre Dame, why couldn't it work here?"

Researchers develop new AIDS drugs

Associated Press

NEW ORLEANS - Two new approaches to fighting the AIDS virus, including a drug ordinarily given to arthritis victims, have provided encouraging but preliminary results, researchers said Wednesday.

D-penicillamine, a medicine used against severe rheumatoid arthritis, blocked the AIDS virus from reproducing when given to infected but outwardly healthy men.

"We are approaching this as a way to protect people who are currently infected" but have not yet developed the disease, said Dr. Richard Schulof of George Washington University.

The doctors gave the drug for six weeks to five homosexual men who had swollen lymph glands but no other AIDS signs. Three of them remained free of the virus for six weeks after they stopped taking the drug.

A major drawback of the therapy, however, was its suppression of the men's T-cells, the same variety of white blood cells that are attacked by the AIDS virus. T-cells are key components of the body's immune system.

"This is a very preliminary study, but it clearly showed antiviral activity," said Schulof. "We are trying to find a dose that is more tolerable on a long-term basis."

The study was presented at a meeting of the American Society for Microbiology, along with a report on another new AIDS drug that has not yet been tested on people.

This medicine, called CS-85, appears to work similarly to AZT, the first drug found to change the course of AIDS. Dr. Raymond Schinazi, who developed CS-85 at Emory University, said it appears to be less toxic than AZT.

Although it doesn't cure the disease, AZT prolongs victims' lives and reduces the overwhelming infections that result from the destruction of their immune systems. However, AZT also suppresses bone marrow cells that produce blood cells.

Schinazi said that in the test tube, CS-85 is as effective as AZT at halting the AIDS virus. And it appears to be 10 to 100 times less toxic.

$556 billion package kept intact by Senate

Associated Press

WASHINGTON - The Senate wrestled Wednesday with the major spending bill of the new fiscal year, but the coming U.S.-Soviet summit was dampening prospects for speedy enactment.

Trying to finish work by next week to head for the campaign trail, the Senate was keeping its $556 billion spending package clean of amendments. In a series of votes, it turned down proposals to add a sweeping new farm program, seniority protection for airline employees and new rules for tenant-management of public housing.

Majority Leader Bob Dole, R-Kan., said he wanted to pass the bill by the weekend, so compromise talks with the House could be completed early next week. Congress has given itself until Oct. 8 to approve the spending program for fiscal 1987, which began Wednesday, under a stop-gap spending measure signed into law by President Reagan.

However, it appeared a House-Senate detente would be difficult and an extension of the temporary measure would be necessary. House Democrats were insisting on including in any compromise at least some of the series of arms control amendments contained in their $562 billion version of the bill.

Republicans said news of the summit made it imperative that Congress not tie Reagan's hands. He meets with Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev in Iceland on Oct. 11 and 12.

Rep. Les Aspin, D-Wis., chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, said the summit announcement had stalled talks with the Senate over the arms control language. "It's at an impasse," he said.

The House approved provisions called for a ban on testing nuclear weapons so long as the Soviets didn't hold tests, adherence to the SALT II treaty, a freeze on spending for the "Star Wars" missile defense program, a hold on anti-satellite weapons tests and a ban on chemical weapons.

Over 3,500 homeless in Midwest flooding

Associated Press

More rain fell Wednesday across the Midwest and Plains, where flooding has left more than 3,500 people homeless, and Oklahoma's National Guard was asked to help in one county where "some people are cut off and trapped."

A partially ruptured dam in Wisconsin remained standing but leaking, and hundreds were believed still away from their homes in flooded northeastern Montana, but the water was receding in some communities.

One man died Wednesday when he was swept from his stalled pickup on a bridge in Oklahoma, and another was missing and presumed dead in Illinois. One person died last week in Montana.

One Kansas man spent the night in a tree after his car was washed away.

Flood-ravaged northeastern Illinois got gentle rain Wednesday, but 2 to 3 inches fell during the morning in hard-hit Oklahoma, and southern Missouri got 5 inches. Heavy rain also fell in Indiana and Ohio. The National Weather Service reported three-day totals of up to 15 inches in parts of northeastern Oklahoma, nearly half the usual annual precipitation.

A hole in the earthen portion of a dam on Lawrence Lake near Westfield, Wis., expanded Wednesday, then stopped growing as the lake level dropped after flood gates were opened.

Nearly 200 residents of Westfield, a town of about 1,000 people, allowed to return home Wednesday, were ordered out again in the afternoon, then let back home again after the hole stopped growing. They were first ordered out Tuesday out of fear that the concrete slab forming the lake side of the dam would not hold.

Water coming through cracks in the concrete had eroded a hole estimated at 65 feet by 25 feet in the earth piled against the face of the dam.

Asbestos to be removed from schools

Associated Press

WASHINGTON - Congressional negotiators agreed Wednesday on legislation ordering the safe but costly removal of cancer-causing asbestos from up to 30,000 public schools around the country.

"This is landmark legislation," said Sen. Robert Stafford, R-Vt., chairman of the Environment Committee. "This will be a big victory for the country."

"This is the sleeper environmental legislation of the year," said Rep. James Florio, D-N.J., the chief House negotiator on the bill. "We've been able to get it with bipartisan support and cooperation."

Within hours, the House endorsed the legislation, a compromise version of separate plans passed by the House and Senate to strengthen efforts to end health threats to as many as 15 million children and 1.5 million school employees.

Stafford, speaking at a news conference, predicted easy Senate approval within a week, but the bill's future with the Reagan administration was another matter.

The Environmental Protection Agency issued a statement supporting the bill's goals but listing its reservations about its "many regulatory requirements." EPA said it would decide in the next few days whether to recommend a veto to President Reagan.

EPA currently only requires that public schools be inspected for the presence of crumbling and unstable asbestos, which can release airborne fibers that over a length of time cause a variety of lung ailments, including cancer.

Money and prestige can dominate job hunting

Recruiting season is back in full swing and all those people you see out there running around in dark suits, white shirts and red "power" ties are just us law students, desperately trying to get a job... finally.

With the possible exception of final exams, recruiting season has to be the most frustrating, least enjoyable time of year on campus. Even the last five football seasons didn't curdle as many stomachs as one good, solid week of interviews. The haircuts, the dresses, the polished shoes...they're all signs that students' priorities have suddenly shifted.

here, there and back

Something crazy happens to our brains when we're on the job hunt. I've never made more than six dollars an hour in my life but I recently found myself whining because a firm I was interested in was only paying $30,000 a year. I have no idea what it's like to make $30,000 a year and no idea why I would ever think that wasn't enough money for me to get started on. My father probably makes about $30,000 a year and he's taking care of a wife, two kids, three cars, a house, a lake cottage, and a fat cocker spaniel. My goal when I get out of school is to have enough money to buy season tickets to see the Indianapolis Checkers' games. I think $30,000 will probably cut it.

The worst thing about interviews is that as soon as anybody mentions the word "job," we all tend to forget everything we've ever learned here. I don't mean we can't remember which side is the assets and which side is the liabilities, I mean we forget the way we've been taught to use what we've learned when we finally venture out there beyond Juniper Road. Suddenly money and prestige and perks become more important than having a good job and doing a good job at it.

It's easy to lose your perspective when you're on the job market or even after you're on the job. Principles become fuzzy when they're pushed beyond the desire to excel and the struggle to the top. Sometimes it's hard to remember just what exactly you're doing. Clients become job numbers and co-workers become obstacles to success.

I had a rough experience that really put the perspective back into what I was doing this summer. I was clerking at a law firm in my hometown and was assigned a fairly broad range of cases. I almost always spoke of my cases according to the legal theory involved in each. The client, who was the real reason I was doing all this work to begin with, was essential only as far as he gave a title to the case I was working on. I knew the names of all my clients and had met or spoken to most of them as well. But to some degree they weren't really people, they were just legal theories.

One of my cases involved a client who had been ripped off in a contract for the sale of some animals. I had met with the client a couple of times and had spoken to him over the phone. Yet, he wasn't really real. I never spoke of his case as "Mr. X's case," but always as "the negligent misrepresentation case." The client was just the guy to whom the theory applied.

One day toward the end of summer, this client's 16-year-old son was killed in a freak automobile accident. The attorney who was handing the case was out of town, so I had to go to the funeral home to represent the firm. It was, without question, the worst thing I had to do all summer, but it taught me more about being a lawyer than probably anything I could ever do in the office or in the library.

The funeral home wasn't filled with documents and exhibits and depositions. It wasn't even filled with the defendant, the opposing counsel or the witnesses. It was filled with people - real people, my people, my client included. He was no longer just a legal theory, he was a real man, a man with a family he loved, a man with regular everyday problems just like myself. For some strange reason, I had never thought of him as just a regular man, a guy who goes home and sits down at the dinner table with his family each night or sits up wondering what time his kids will be in. But I saw him consoling other members of his family, I remembered that all summer I had been representing a man, not just a legal theory.

I got back a lot of my perspective on my future career there in that funeral home, perspective that had once been firmly implanted in my idealistic mind but had been lost in the day-to-day workings of my law firm before I had even gotten out of school. I re-discovered that helping the client really is what being a lawyer is all about, no matter how distant the client seems from behind the desk.

Now, today, as I sit down to plan for more interviews, that perspective tries to sneak away again. The temptation of the big dollar sometimes makes me turn to the salary section of the firm resumes rather than to the section that describes the atmosphere of the firm or the kind of work it does. The temptation of a prestigious firm pulls me away from the simplicity of my Hoosier roots and toward the hidden traps of the big city.

I don't want to make my career decision based on how much money I'm going to be making or how famous my new firm is. I'm not crazy, either - I'd be lying if I said salary won't be a factor in my final choice. I just don't want it to be the factor that determines how I finally decide. Still, the temptation to go for the big money haunts me, and I can't figure out why.

Maybe if I took off this damn red tie... There, that's more like it.

Ridiculously large lines make eating difficult

Dear Editor:

I would like to use this opportunity and public forum to extend a heartfelt thanks to the anonymous administrative whiz who, thinking only of the students in the finest Judeo-Christian tradition of selflessness, designed Notre Dame's dining hall system. When I and countless thousands of other equally gluttonous students swarm towards a despicable, orgiastic feeding frenzy after 12:05, we are saved from our own base, self-destructive cravings by a system which forces us to recognize the emptiness and bankruptcy of unchecked lust for sustenance. A huge crowd daily gathers at the dining hall clamouring for entrance and hedonistic consumption. The stalwart system, however, resists the pressure of these masses and admits only a trickle of students. The food-crazed youths, who often face a 1:15 class, become discouraged by the size of the crowd and abandon their vile, contemptable mission.

Some leftists may claim that enforced good behavior strips the individual of free will and cheapens the significance of the good act. I scoff at these lilly-livered secularists who would sell our futures for a vat of veal marango. The furtherance of moderate living is a noble achievement regardless of the means.

Thanks again to that far-sighted administrator and the system he created.

Positively Dumptruck

Dumptruck's hummable

KEVIN D. WALSH
features writer

Most of my albums tend to gravitate toward a certain place in the week or time of the year where they just seem to naturally belong. R.E.M. is a Sunday afternoon band. I only listen to the Bongos in the fall and Prefab Sprout loses something if played in the middle of the summer. I would never listen to the Ramones on a Wednesday. It just wouldn't seem right.

Positively Dumptruck, the Boston band's second album, is another one of these albums. Right now it seems to be pretty much of a winter album. Despite the heavy-duty name, Dumptruck creates a pretty airy sound out of their three guitars and drums. They would probably list the usual group of current hip influences, like the Byrds and the Velvet Underground, but they also have something of a Celtic sound, inexplicably. Because of this, they come out sounding like a cross between R.E.M. and Big Country.

The first song is called "Back

Where I Belong" and it is probably one of the most bitter songs ever recorded. The song opens up with a simple bass line and measure-by-measure the rest of the band kicks in. It features one of the grungiest guitar sounds I've heard this far into the eighties. The lyrics, like I said, are pretty resentful.

Where the hell were you when I was all alone with a thousand people asking me my name?

In "Nine People," the chorus asks the listener "For a moment think of anyplace you've been or want to be for a moment think of anyplace but here..." and despite the fact that it is just a lowly pop song, it forces you to think. It isn't a power that many bands choose to exercise. If for no other reason than that, I would recommend this record.

The rest of the songs range from the hummable to the forgettable. None are really disappointing. Over a drifting guitar, "Winter" marvels first at the power of nature over man, then at the power that man has acquired to destroy nature. In "Ethics" they sing about a pathetic but not unfamiliar emotion:

*Been hurt badly,
but the pain is semi-self-inflicted It's 3 a.m. and I have no ambition to sleep
So I sit here waiting, thinking of things to take up my time*

It sounds like the end of a bad SYR to me.

Songs like "Walk Into Mirrors" and "Secrets" point up the main flaw in the record and in fact, the band. That is the lead singer's voice. Sure it's real cool now to sing with very little voice at all -- look at Lou Reed or Bob Dylan but those two guys have their songs to lean on. Dumptruck does not. The spidery melodies of their songs do not lend themselves readily to a mediocre singer. In all fairness, I will say that his voice sounds great in harmony, but that is only done in about half the songs.

Dumptruck's second album is a respectable second effort. Producer Don Dixon did change their sound a bit from the drone-like sound of their first album, but I think it's positive and I hope they work with him again on their third album.

Smiths poppy not so gloomy

features writer

After listening to The Queen Is Dead, the latest album from England's mega-popular band the Smiths, I have to admit that these guys aren't as pathetic as I thought. See, I really liked this band a while ago, but after too much Morrissey and too much vegetarianism and too much hype, I got really sick of these guys. So it's been a good two-year rest and I can handle hearing them again.

The Smiths really aren't that bad, despite lead singer and main lyricist Morrissey's delicate pretensions. Even though a few of the songs here lull the listener to sleep and some of the lyrics are just plain ridiculous, The Queen Is Dead comes across as a pretty enjoyable pop album, something perfect for today's Eurocentric college campuses.

In the interim since Hatful of Hollow, a 1984 British release by the band, Morrissey's outlook on life has become a bit less depressing, and he even attempts some humor at times ("I want to live and I want to love/ I want to catch something that I might be ashamed of"). His superior attitude which he uses to skewer the Queen and plagiarize Keats and Yeats and various others can become overbearing, but his songs of self-doubt, "Never Had No One Ever" and "There Is a Light That Never Goes Out," seem to bring him into truer light. The latter takes his death fixation and exposes it in real-life detail:

*And if a 10-ton truck
Kills the both of us
To die by your side
The pleasure and privilege is mine*

Though I doubt the "artistic" value of these lyrics, I believe this sentiment is heartfelt.

So what about the music? Well, if you've heard this band before, don't expect a radical change -- just lots of strumming guitars in the fast numbers and pensive playing elsewhere.

Now, on to my main beef about the Smiths, or rather, about Morrissey. Lyrics that come dangerously close to being dumb pop up in a few places. "Some Girls Are Bigger Than Others" is pointless through and through. And here's another snippet that fails as badly as Philip Michael Thomas' solo album did. It's from "Bigmouth Strikes Again":

*Now I know how Joan of Arc felt
As the flames rose to her Roman nose*

And her Walkman started to melt Say what?

So the Smiths have convinced me, at least temporarily, that they still deserve a chance to be heard from even the most close-minded of listeners. No, I'm not a rabid fan of theirs, but many people are and I won't hold that against them. If strumming guitars, well-constructed pop songs, and slightly melancholy (and silly) lyrics appeal to you, get it. And you, listening to your punk and heavy metal albums and feeling so smug, pry open that mind and at least hear this stuff before you ignore it.

Sigue's commercial

features writer

Sigue Sigue Sputnik is the name of a Moscow street gang. It is also the name of Great Britain's latest pop music phenomenon from the Frankie Goes to Hollywood school of musicianship.

This school teaches as its main tenet that if a band has no talent, they must make brash statements (like "I hate all women, especially fat ones."); create an outrageous image (like using gelatin to get six inch spikes in their hair); and spend their time telling everyone how great they are (including having their album begin with the words "I wanna be a star!"). If a band is successful in all of these areas, they might fool people long enough to sell a million albums, make a million dollars and become bonafide Pop Stars. Then, just as quickly as they emerged, they can return to the hole from which they crawled and stay there, living off their royalties. This strategy worked for Frankie, but it fails with the Sputnik boys.

Sigue Sigue Sputnik is a quintet put together by leader Tony

James, who picked its members not on the basis of musical talent, but because of what they looked like. In fact, none of the members knew how to play any instruments whatsoever. They still do not know how to play those instruments. In short, this band possesses absolutely no talent and it becomes readily apparent after just one hearing of this album, entitled Flaunt It. Their pop-star strategy fails because they cannot mask this lack of talent the way Frankie was able to do.

The band's sound is generated almost solely by the use of computerized programming and other studio production techniques masterminded by producer Giorgio Moroder. Moroder was one of the first to bring synthesizers into popular music during his work with Donna Summer and some of the other big disco stars of the '70's. With Sputnik, his job was made easy. All he had to do was program into a sequencer the same two-note synthesizer melody for virtually every song. This task is something akin to plugging "Chopsticks" into a computer and having the computer churn the same melody out at twice the speed.

James, the Sputnik spokesman and former partner of Billy Idol in Gen X, admits to playing music that sounds like the music used in commercials. In fact, the whole album is one big commercial for a product called Sigue Sigue Sputnik. The band has put itself on the same level as floor wax or hemorrhoids ointment.

For example, the cover of the album looks like an advertisement for a Rambo-esque robot doll. In addition, the band requested that commercials for such products as magazines and hair spray be placed between songs in order to keep the price of the album down. It's being sold for list price anyway. Finally, the band formed a company called the Sputnik Corporation, probably to protect them from suits filed against them by people who want their money back.

Their first single, "Love Missile F1-11," is actually a good song. Its melody is catchy and it contains enough pseudo-anger in its beat to be a pretty good dance song. Flaunt It fails because every other song tries to use virtually the same melody and beat as "Love Missile," but they all fail miserably and the album ends up sounding like a forty minute version of "Love Missile."

Sigue Sigue Sputnik is the living embodiment of everything that I despise in music today. They are nothing but a hyped product, with no talent whatsoever. Even though I do like "Love Missile," because its programming succeeds where the other songs fail, I can only give this album a half star. Finally, do not buy this album and do not be fooled by those who say that it is good.

"Strong safety is just like an extra linebacker -he's closer to the line," says Bobb, comparing to the free-safety spot. "But I wasn't the physical type. I possessed finesse. I always seemed to be able to make the play."

Change was in the air when spring drills rolled around that year. Bobb was moved to the other side of the line of scrimmage to the fullback position.

"They were looking for a third fullback," he says. "I had alot of doubt. I weighed only 185 pounds, but they wanted to try me."

The fullback position presented two problems for Bobb. One problem was he had not played the position since high school, and was slightly rusty on technique. The other was the competition against Pernell Taylor, who was just coming off knee surgery.

"We were friends," he says. "It seemed like we were battling each other for the third fullback spot."

"I felt uncomfortable. It seemed like it was coming between Pernell and I being friends."

"I tried to keep his confidence up," he continued. "But then Pernell really came out of his shell, and the coaches decided to move me back."

He did not see any action his junior year while he improved his academic standing. But he continued to work out with the team, this time as a cornerback.

Bobb saw action in the Purdue and Michigan State games on defense. He also is on the punt and punt-return teams.

Not only is Bobb a favorite of the kids at Logan Center, but he also is a favorite at the pep rallies.

"My name is Bobb," he says with a slight hint of a British accent. "James Bobb. Agent double-O 19. Licensed to stick."

Somehow it is comforting to know he is on Notre Dame's side.

Toledo pummels SMC

The Saint Mary's tennis team fell to the University of Toledo on Tuesday, 9-0.

Toledo, a heavily-favored NCAA team, played strong tennis according to Saint Mary's coach Deb Laverie.

"Toledo played an aggressive match," she said. "We could have played better."

The Belles, 5-4 for the season, still have their goals set for a flawless NAIA season. Despite the loss to Toledo, several players showed consistency.

In her match against Lisa Donnelly, Saint Mary's freshman Jennifer Block lost a tight first set, 7-5, and fell in the second set, 6-0.

"Jennifer had a good first set but was not tenacious enough during the second set," explained Laverie.

Sophomore Sandy Hickey was nipped in the first set, 7-5, by Toledo's Ann Harrah, and dropped the second set, 6-3.

"That was an exciting match," said Laverie. "Sandy played excellent tennis."

The second-seeded doubles team of Block and junior Kate McDevitt was defeated by Christi Smith and Missy Buck, 6-2, 6-3.

"Although they lost, Kate and Jennifer played tough," said Laverie.

The Belles are preparing for this weekend's Saint Mary's College Invitational, where they will play host to Butler, DePauw, St. Francis, Valparaiso and the University of Chicago.

"We are confident for the invitational," Laverie said. "We look forward to playing hard tennis."

Line drive injures Clemens

Associated Press

BOSTON - Roger Clemens, making his last start for Boston before the American League playoffs, was hit by a line drive near the right elbow and was removed from the game last night against the Baltimore Orioles.

Clemens, who has a 24-4 record for the East Division champion Red Sox, was struck by a ball hit by Baltimore catcher John Stefero with runners on first and third and two outs in the second inning.

Winfield looks for some peace

Associated Press

NEW YORK - After five straight 100 RBI seasons, outfielder Dave Winfield of the New York Yankees isn't looking for accolades, only peace and quiet.

"I really would like next year and any successive year to play the game without it," Winfield said of his constant verbal battle with Yankees' owner George Steinbrenner. "You don't have to praise me and pat me on the back, just leave me alone in a supportive atmosphere."

"I don't know if I would consider this extending a palm leaf, but it would be interesting to be supportive and see what kind of productivity I could get."

Winfield, who signed a $23.3 million, 10-year contract with the Yankees before the 1981 season, is closing out another productive season and one of the stormiest years with Steinbrenner in the pair's often turbulent relationship.

When Winfield knocked in two runs in Monday night's 8-1 victory over Toronto, he became the first Yankees' player to drive in 100 runs five consecutive seasons since Joe DiMaggio had a seven-year streak between 1936-1942.

His .263 average, 24 homers and 102 RBI going into Wednesday night's game have kept Steinbrenner quiet on Winfield lately. But when Winfield was the last Yankees' player to report to spring training this season, Steinbrenner was upset.

"It tells me something about the man," he said.

A .222 average at midseason had the right-handed hitting Winfield benched against right-handed pitchers, at Steinbrenner's insistence, although the 34-year-old outfielder was named to the starting lineup for the American League in the All-Star Game.

The All-Star selection gave Winfield a chance to fire back, wondering aloud how an all-star player could be sitting on the bench.

"I still try to treat baseball as a game and try to have fun," he said. "But sometimes it becomes so much of a business that it isn't fun. I don't want to have to deal with defending myself. I think I do pretty well every day."

ND volleyball earns four-game win despite 'trash' from Lady Saints

By RICK RIETBROCK
Sports Writer

Notre Dame head coach Art Lambert was angry about trash last night. But not the kind that gets hauled away in a truck.

Instead, it was the St. Francis Lady Saints' hitting attack that was the source of his anguish. Behind a series of dinks, dumps and tips, the Lady Saints topped the Irish in the first game of a best-of-five match before Notre Dame came back to sweep the last three games.

"It was trash, but if it works it's smart," he said, referring to the St. Francis attack. "They knew where we were vulnerable, but I think we adjusted to that style fairly well the rest of the way."

St. Francis came flying out of the gates in game one and scored the first five points of the match. The Irish were caught a bit flat-footed and found themselves a half-step too late on most shots as they dropped a 15-13 decision.

The second game, a 15-5 Irish victory, featured the combination of freshman setter Taryn Collins and sophomore Mary Kay Waller and a lot of sloppy play. Waller finished with eight kills but Lambert could not forget the sloppiness.

"Different referees call different types of games, but that second game got really bad," he said. "I thought that one hit was a forward pass."

In the third game, the Lady Saints started to self-destruct and Notre Dame continued to get stronger. An all-around better effort featured some good blocking from Zanette Bennett and Maureen Shea, and the solid passing of Collins paved the way to a 15-7 Notre Dame win.

Game four had "rout" written all over it as the Irish jumped out to an 8-3 lead behind good work from Kathy Morin, Shea and Bennett. But poor passes, missed serves and a final surge by St. Francis tied it at eight.

Bennett then went on a binge with four kills and the Irish cruised to a 15-8 win.

Lambert said this match showed the Irish what needs to be done to move up one more notch in its performance.

"A good team has got to make adjustments to the style of the opponent and the referees," he said. "Once we learn to do that, we're going to be a fine team."

The Irish will put their 1-0 North Star Conference record on the line against two tough conference opponents this weekend with Marquette visiting on Friday and DePaul coming Saturday. Both Kathy Cunningham and Whitney Shewman, who sat out last night's game because of tendonitis in their knees, should be ready to play this weekend.

Both matches are at the ACC Pit beginning at 7:30 p.m.

Bobb gaining fame in starting role

By PETE GEGEN
Assistant Sports Editor

Though he only started in his first game last week, the James Bobb Fan Club is already forming.

Bobb, a senior free safety for the Irish, got his first starting assignment in the 41-9 Notre Dame victory over Purdue. He recorded three tackles and broke up a pass on a fourth-and-goal play against the Boilermakers.

But the group that watches Bobb's every move on the field also knows him away from the football field. The group is made up of children Bobb works with at Logan Center.

"I'd been hearing about Logan Center as a freshman, and I was curious," he said. "So my roommate (Dan Coughlin) and I went over one day, and we really had a good time. I just got hooked."

The kids got hooked on Bobb also. This season, they made a giant banner for the home games which reads, "James Bobb 19 Go Irish." And the entire group will be in attendance at the Penn State game to cheer on the Irish and Bobb.

The children from Logan are

not the only ones to recognize Bobb on the field.

"Free safety is his natural position," noted Irish secondary coach Terry Forbes. "It helps to have a man of the character like Jim Bobb has. He gives his best every time. He has good skills and good speed for a free safety, and has the ability to hit."

After stints at the strong-safety, fullback, and cornerback positions, Bobb made the transition to free safety last spring when Steve Lawrence was out with a knee injury. Now the two share the free-safety job.

"I really don't mind," says Bobb on sharing the position. "You're going to have injuries. It's all a part of college football—you've got to have depth."

"It's nice for the secondary to be two-deep, for the second team to play just as well as the first team."

It took three years for Bobb to finally get settled in his natural position.

In his sophomore year, Bobb was the backup strong safety to Joe Johnson. He saw action in eight games, recording six tackles.

Bowling Green tops Irish in physical contest, 3-1

Special to The Observer

In a physical contest, the Notre Dame soccer team lost to Bowling Green, 3-1, yesterday in Ohio.

A total of 59 fouls and four yellow cards were called against both teams.

After taking a 1-0 halftime lead, Bowling Green's Tom Kasten scored a goal at the 67:27 mark after taking a punt from his keeper, Mickey Loescher.

Irish sweeper Pat Szanto cut the lead to 2-1 with a goal at the 73:08 mark off a set play run by forward Bill Gross.

Notre Dame, however, hurt itself when it deflected a punt from Loescher past keeper Hugh Breslin into its own net with only two minutes left to play. Loescher was credited with his second assist of the afternoon on that goal.

CFA thriving on strong relationship with TV networks

(Editor's note - Today The Observer continues its three-part series on the College Football Association and its impact on college football. Today's second part takes a look at the CFA and television.)

The College Football Association has burst onto the scene in the last three years to provide not only more quality college football games each Saturday, but a vital forum of top college programs for discussion of problems and changes in the National Collegiate Athletic Association.

The CFA is thriving, and one of the main cogs spurring it on to increasing popularity has been and will continue to be its excellent relationship with the television networks.

"The CFA today," said Notre Dame Athletic Director Gene Corrigan, "is known more than anything else as being a television entity. It essentially negotiates television contracts for 63 schools."

In 1981, several CFA schools tried to strike out on their own and organize a separate television package with NBC.

When the NCAA threatened these schools with sanctions such as probationary status in other major sports if the NBC deal went through, the CFA launched and won an anti-trust suit against the NCAA. From that time on, the CFA has held good standing with the networks.

Up until this year, ABC and ESPN have covered CFA contests. However, the CFA is now in the process of wrapping up a four-year deal with CBS and ESPN. Bidding was heavy for the contract, another evidence of the CFA's improving status.

"We are extremely satisfied with the new contract," said a spokesperson for Chuck Neinas, executive director of the CFA. "Although the deal hasn't been finalized yet, we're confident that the present terms will be settled upon without a hitch, and that both parties will benefit substantially."

Corrigan agrees and understands that a deal of this magnitude is a step in the right direction for the CFA and college football in general.

Gene Corrigan

"What we feel we've put together," said Corrigan, "is financially good for our 63 schools because of the great national exposure they'll receive. I'd really like to see moving in the same direction for the betterment of college athletics. We're disappointed in the Pac 10 and the Big 10, but overall, I'm very pleased."

Since the formation of the CFA, The Pac 10 and Big 10 conferences have refused to join the group, and next year ABC plans to televise games involving those conferences. This idea worries Corrigan, not because of the competition, but because of the implications of the move within the sport itself.

"The last thing we need," said Corrigan, "is their conferences against the CFA in a bidding war for network television contracts. If they try with a major network flops because there are fewer teams (20 against the CFA's 63) and no eastern teams involved, it's not good for the sport and so it's not good for the CFA."

But with more cable-television possibilities yet to be explored and the signing of a new four-year deal in the offing, there is plenty of promise in the CFA camp. This year's Notre Dame-Michigan game attracted the largest television audience for a regular-season college football game in three years.

No wonder they're optimistic. "No," said Corrigan, "I don't foresee the CFA's downfall for quite a while." (tomorrow: The CFA and its impact on colleges, including Notre Dame)
