University chose to maintain relationship with apparel brand instead of terminating contract

By ANN MARIE JAKUBOWSKI

After controversy over labor rights in an Indonesian factory prompted several universities to terminate contracts with adidas, the German apparel giant has reached a settlement regarding unpaid funds owed to laborers.

As of April 8, 10 schools suspended their contracts with adidas at the urging of the United Students Against Sweatshops group, according to a USA TODAY report. The schools included Cornell, Penn State and Georgetown, but not Notre Dame.

In 2005, Notre Dame signed an exclusive 10-year contract with adidas to have the company supply footwear and apparel to the Irish varsity athletic teams. The current contract lasts through the 2013-2014 season, according to a 2005 press release.

A report dated Jan. 18, 2012, from the Worker Rights Consortium (WRC), a labor rights monitoring association said the PT Kizone factory in Tangerang, Indonesia, employed approximately 2,800 people before its closure in April 2011. It produced collegiate licensed apparel for adidas and Nike, and non-collegiate apparel for Dallas Cowboys Merchandising and other brands.

The crisis began in 2010, when PT Kizone “stopped paying mandatory terminal compensation to workers separated from employment,” the report said. In January 2011, the factory owner fled the nation, “precipitating the factory’s eventual closure and leaving no money

Fellowship honors Zhang

By REBECCA O'NEIL
News Writer

Last fall, the 2013 NDnano Undergraduate Research Fellowship (NURF) was dedicated to Saint Mary's sophomore Ziqi Zhang, who died when she was struck by a car near the College's entrance in October 2012. This spring, Saint Mary's junior Rachael Bridgman received the fellowship in Zhang's memory.

Zhang participated in the NURF program during the summer of 2012, and Bridgman said she “[hopes] to do her name justice.”

“It is a true honor to be able to continue down the path that Ziqi loved, which was research,” Bridgman said. “I am happy to do this summer job in part on her behalf because this is what she would have done this summer. I have heard only wonderful things about her.”

Bridgman she said she didn't know she was under consideration for the fellowship until recipients were announced on April 12.

“I think I was chosen because I am from Saint Mary's and also have a great deal of passion for the research I am doing,” she said. “I have also shown a lot of dedication to the lab. I have been working there all year and have put in many hours and come in on the weekends as well to do work.”

This grant, offered by the University of Notre Dame Center for Nano Science and Technology, provides Bridgman, a molecular cell biology major, with an opportunity to experience her first paid research position this summer.

“It covers a 10-week research opportunity with [Notre Dame biochemistry professor] Dr. Zach Schultz in his biochemistry lab and weekly seminars

SMC English professor to retire

By KELLY KONYA
News Writer

Saint Mary’s English professor Frances Hwang will retire from teaching after this year to pursue a writing career in California.

Hwang teaches two courses for English Writing majors, literary non-fiction writing and fiction writing.

Sophomore Lauren Coppinger said the fiction writing class has been one of her favorite classes this semester. “Professor Hwang is an amazing person and teacher,” Coppinger said. “She is always so supportive of the class’s creative pieces and provides helpful insight to improve our writing.” Hwang said she instructs her courses in a discussion-based manner and teaches students literary techniques like how to master the use of flashbacks or how to create memorable symbols.

Hwang said it wasn’t an easy decision to leave the English department and the gifted writers in her classes, but she thinks the College deserves a full-time writing professor as opposed to her part-time efforts.

“This arrangement was ideal for me and worked for four years, but more and more I felt an emotional tug to move back and settle down in California,” Hwang said.

In California, Hwang said she plans to dedicate her time to her writing career. She has already received fellowships from the National Endowment for the Arts, the Fine Arts Work Center in Provincetown, the MacDowell Colony, the Wisconsin Institute for Creative Writing and Colgate University.

Hwang has published a collection of short stories titled “Transparency,” which won two awards, and her work has appeared in “Best New American Voices,” “Glimmer Train,” “Tin House” and “The New Yorker.”

“I read her piece from 2010 in ‘The New Yorker’ titled ‘Blue Roses’ and was amazed,” Coppinger said. “She is such a talented writer and brings such emotion and detail through in her narrative voice.”

Hwang said teaching her courses always helps her discover new things about herself, like making sure to emphasize positive feedback.

“Working with students makes me realize that I need to take this more gentle, humane approach with them and with myself,” Hwang said. “I need to remember to quiet my internal critic so that I, too, can move forward in my work.”

Junior Landess Kearns, another student in the fiction writing course, said Hwang inspires her to write in ways she never considered.

“I have been so inspired this semester by the material of our course,” Kearns said. “From reading Saul Bellow’s ‘Seize the Day’ to listening to my peers’ work, it’s been incredibly valuable to me as a writer.”

The class is currently completing their own novellas, which have been the focus of most of the semester, according to Hwang.

She said in the past, students’ novellas have inspired her, and she finds it rewarding to be able to teach the form and discover why it continually succeeds as an art.

“I will miss her next year, but I know that she will produce some amazing pieces that will benefit all of literature,” Kearns said. “I look forward to seeing her next publications.”

To aspiring writers, Hwang said it is important to remain confident in the face in rejection and to keep reading and writing as much as possible.

“All writers have bad days, and sometimes you have to give yourself permission to write badly in order to get anywhere at all,” Hwang said. “Lose your self-consciousness so you can get deep into your writing. You can always go back and make it better.”

Study classifies depression risk factor as contagious

By HENRY GENS
News Writer

Things that are contagious: laughter, yawning, sneezing, the common cold. And now somewhere on that list you’ll find cognitive vulnerability.

A recent study by Notre Dame psychology professor Gerald Haefel, published in the journal Clinical Psychological Science, found that a risk factor for depression known as ‘cognitive vulnerability’ can be passed from one individual to another.

Haefel said cognitive vulnerability is essentially a style of thinking about events and personal reflection, not to be confused with the mood of depression itself. Cognitive vulnerability can be a powerful predictor of future depressive episodes, he said.

“To give an example, say two people both fail a test here. The college student who is at risk for depression will think, ‘This means I’m stupid, or worthless, I’m never going to get into grad school now,’ and when they’re sad, they just focus on this,” Haefel said. “They’re stuck on ‘I feel so sad, why do I feel so miserable, what’s wrong with me?’ That’s the person who’s at risk for depression.” Haefel said.

“Whereas another student who gets the same failing grade might think ‘I didn’t work hard enough, I’ll work harder on the next one. I’ll catch up, I’ll be fine, I’ll still get into grad school,” he said. “And when they feel sad, they go and play basketball or go play a sport or do whatever.

That person’s not at risk for depression.”

Haefel said conventional wisdom in the psychology field has held that cognitive vulnerability in individuals remains relatively stable throughout life, past adolescence.

“We thought that there were going to be times when it might change. These would be times during major life transitions, times when you go into a new social environment where you’re surrounded by new people who have all new ways of thinking,” Haefel said. “We thought that [in these times] it might rub off and actually be contagious.”

To investigate this hypothesis, Haefel said he and Jennifer Hames, a 2009 graduate of Notre Dame, conducted a study on 103 pairs of randomly assigned freshman roommates at the University. Haefel surveyed the students on the two aspects of cognitive vulnerability — event interpretation and self-reflection — when the freshmen first arrived, three months later, and at the end of the academic year, six months later.

Haefel found that those who had a roommate with a negative way of thinking about the world caught some of that style and became more negative in their own thinking. At the final survey, those who had their cognitive vulnerability adversely influenced were at a significantly greater risk for depression.

“This is the first study to show that these can change more easily than you thought,” Haefel said. “In three months, we saw changes in vulnerability that then actually meant something for future depressive symptoms.”

Haefel emphasized that these findings on the relative malleability of cognitive vulnerability have implications in treatment of depression. He said those suffering from the disorder could benefit greatly from a treatment such as Cognitive Behavioral Therapy, which focuses on how individuals think about events and themselves.

“If people are struggling with depression, we always hear on the news that the best treatments are medication,” Haefel said. “But this therapy is as effective as medication and it’s time-limited so you don’t have to take it your whole life. It also has a relapse-prevention effect, unlike medication.

“You learn the skills and it keeps you safe from depression in the future, which tends to be highly recurrent.”

Librarian discusses future of academic publishing

By MARISSA PIE
News Writer

Bryn Geffert, Amherst College librarian, addressed the currently flawed state of the libraries on campuses across the country in his lecture, "Academic Libraries and Academic Publishing: The Good, The Bad, and the Ugly."

The Saint Mary's College

Cushwa-Leighton Library hosted Geffert on Tuesday night in an effort to provide students with optimal researching capacities.

Geffert, who previously served as the library director at the United States Military Academy, said he wanted to foster a world where all scholars would be able to access information with only an Internet connection regardless of where they live.

He said typically, a researcher is paid for his or her research and when he sends it off to an institution to get published he relinquishes his rights to the piece. In most cases, his institution buys the work back from the publisher, but Geffert said the author does not see a dime of profit unless he sells an unrealistic amount of copies.

"I cannot imagine a more dysfunctional, more in jeopardy state that academic publishing could be in," he said.

"This is an absolutely perverse model. We could not devise something more preposterous.

"And what is the effect? Escalating serials expenditures. Publishers are able to charge whatever prices they want because they have control of the market. The trajectory is absolutely unsustainable, [and] institutions cannot keep up"

Geffert said three major scientific publishers have almost become monopolized: Elsevier, Springer and Wiley. Because these three companies control so much of the market, they are able to charge authors obscene amounts of money to publish their works, he said.

"Now the result is that libraries must pay more and more each year for publishing, leaving less money for books and material for students," he said. "Cambridge University Press has eliminated entire series just because there aren't enough libraries that can afford to buy from them."

In 1986, libraries were spending

44 percent of their budgets on books, according to Geffert. Last year, that number dwindled to 22 percent because they were forced to spend so much on journal publishing costs. At his library at Amherst, 56 disciplines have lost presses since 1993, Geffert said.

"I'm not arguing that there's a shortage of outlets for publishing," he said. "Anyone with a manuscript can get it looked at. But my argument is that there is a need for good, quality, not-for-profit, university presses."

Geffert said hundreds of third-world countries are suffering from empty bookshelves. Geffert said he believes the current library and publishing system is failing that universal mission associated with universities implied by the word's Latin root. "It's hard for universities to provide light to their own students, let alone shedding light on the world," he said. "So what can we do about it? We can accept the status quo and do nothing. Or, we can accept the status quo and work around the edges.

"We can contest the status quo, kicking and screaming and see what happens. Or we can create a new status quo."

The Public Library of Science (PLOS) has done exactly that, Geffert said. He described PLOS as a series of top quality scientific journals, available online for free. An author must pay a fee to see their work published in this library, but most of the contributors are researchers who are funded by government grants, he said. He said the main issue is translating this setup to liberal arts colleges like Amherst or Saint Mary's.

Geffert said he has worked to help Amherst establish a new kind of press that will hopefully make literature available to the largest possible audience.

"We have announced everything [faculty members] publish at the College's press will be available free of charge on the Internet," he said. "Everyone with Internet can access what is published at Amherst. The reader can download and share it. We have been knocked off our seats with how excited the media is."

Through college endowment and volunteers, the College would be able to do so without ever realizing a dime for revenue.

"The ultimate dream behind this endeavor [is] at some point, there is a tipping point at which the savings we are realizing from not borrowing from other institutions will cover the costs," he said.

Though he acknowledged his goals were idealistic, Geffert said he truly believes that if implemented, this system of shared information will change academia.

"I imagine a day where a student in India has the same access to information as a student of a wealthy university as a student in Appalachia. That's the ultimate dream I think we should be striving towards," he said.

with other undergraduate researchers," Bridgman said.

The 28 recipients of the award will receive a total of $5,250 for their participation in research this upcoming summer, but Bridgman said she looks forward to benefits beyond the paycheck.

"I get the chance to explore research as a career and participate in high caliber research," Bridgman said.

Bridgman's unpaid research was driven by a genuine desire to gain a deeper understand of proteins, she said.

"To be honest I have always been very interested in proteins because they are the building blocks for life after the nucleotides that create them," Bridgman said. "Single protein detection using probes is useful for a wide range of applications. It has been used to sequence DNA, differentiate between strains of the influenza and analyze movement of molecules across cell membranes in real time. All these applications can lead to medical therapeutic and diagnostic research as well."

The undergraduate researchers will present the results of their research at the end of the 10 weeks, she said.

"I have to do a presentation at a poster session on my work at the end of the summer," Bridgman said.

Haley Gordon, a sophomore chemistry and chemical engineering major at Saint Mary's and Notre Dame, respectively, said Bridgman's fellowship was well-deserved, and notable because it was given to a Saint Mary's senior.

"She's one of the most hard-working students I know," Gordon said. "She's incredibly diligent."

Bridgman said she plans to pursue a career in cancer research and oncology.

to pay severance.” The report said at the time of closure, employees were owed $3.4 million in total.

Before the compromise was announced April 24, the WRC took issue with adidas being the only university-related company affiliated with the factory to not contribute or pledge to the severance fund or, according to the report.

“Adidas has taken the position that it has no obligation to provide funds to the affected workers,” the report said.

Before the settlement, adidas “did not disclose the violations, denied responsibility and refuses to pay anything,” it said.

The report also said under university codes of conduct, “it is the duty of licensees to correct code violations.”

Michael Low, Notre Dame’s director of licensing, said Notre into the severance fund. They did not believe, and our Code supported the fact that they were not responsible for the illegal act of a third party.”

Low said he considers adidas to be “a worldwide leader” in its efforts to enforce codes of conduct in the factories they contract with.

James Paladino, associate director for business operations at Notre Dame’s Center for Social Concerns, worked on the original formation of the Code of Conduct under former University president Fr. Edward Malloy. He said the University’s approach to issues of social justice focuses more on remediation than shaming.

“Remediation goes along with the rights and responsibilities theme of Catholic Social Teaching,” Paladino said. “If you see an injustice, you shine the light on it. But you also work for positive change rather than just pulling out of the situation.”

Administrators at other universities brought a different approach. Rodney Erickson, president of Pennsylvania State University, sent a letter to the company on March 13 to announce his university’s decision “to suspend the adidas license with Penn State for 60 days, effective immediately.”

“We are confident that adidas’s actions fall short of our expectations for fair, just and humane behavior by licensees toward the laborers that sustain a system from which all of us, particularly our licensees, benefit enormously,” Erickson said in the letter.

The letter stated that if adidas pays its portion of the funds owed to the workers denied compensation within 60 days, the university “will lift [the] suspension and proceed under [the] prior relationship with adidas. However, should adidas fail to do so to the satisfaction of both the Worker Rights Consortium and Penn State ... the university will terminate the license.”

Paladino said his past experiences with workers’ rights disputes in Latin America emphasize the benefits of remediation over termination.

“I went down to El Salvador with a group, and we met with workers who had been laid off. They said, ‘whatever you do, fight for us. Don’t make them pull out,’” he said. “They really wanted to go through remediation. That’s the true piece of justice, making the changes and getting the situation resolved.”

On April 24, adidas announced a solution to the situation in a letter to its university partners, provided by Notre Dame’s associate vice president for auxiliary operations David Harr. The letter said a compromise had been reached to the satisfaction of both adidas and the PT Kizone workers.

“We have been and remain sympathetic to the plight of all former PT Kizone workers,” the letter said. “We have been supportive of the factory workers since we first learned of the factory’s closure and the workers’ hardship.

“The additional aid comes on top of adidas’s earlier contributions in humanitarian aid, job placement services and advocacy on issues related to workers’ rights,” the letter stated.

When a third party is involved in such a dispute, as it was in the PT Kizone case, Low said the University relies on the reports from the Worker Rights Consortium and the Fair Labor Association to advise courses of action.

“Our expectation is that if the company is found to be at fault, they will remedy [the situation] appropriately to satisfy the issue,” Low said. “There’s no issue for us as long as the companies are working in good faith [and] going through remediation.”

The Code qualifies in terms of ethical principles: “Notre Dame Licensees must be committed in the conduct of their business to a set of ethical standards which are not incompatible with those of Notre Dame.”

The Code of Conduct includes honesty, integrity, trustworthiness and “respect for the unique intrinsic value of each human being” in its list of ethical standards, according to the document. Paladino said Notre Dame’s Code is unique in its strong emphasis on the dignity of labor, which is another part of Catholic Social Teaching.

William Purcell, associate director of Catholic Social Teaching for the Center for Social Concerns said the compromise is a “victory” for both adidas and the global community.

“The bottom line here is how we can apply Catholic Social Teaching. It only happens in a practical way,” Purcell said. “You can have all the ideas of solidarity and rights and responsibilities, but how does it get carried out? It’s not just any one thing, but looking at the whole package.

“We integrate Catholic Social Tradition in all we’re trying to do, including in a practical way using the University’s resources and the resources we engage in our local community and the global community,” he said.

Michael Low
director of licensing

Dame was the first university to adopt a Code of Conduct, which is applied to all of its licensees.

Low said the University stayed in contact with adidas during the episode and reviewed reports and recommendations from the WRC and the Fair Labor Association.

“Any time that there is an issue with factory workers and our licensees, we are concerned,” Low said in a phone interview Friday. “In our case, [Notre Dame’s] Code of Conduct doesn’t really address the issue of unpaid severance.

“This was not an adidas factory, this was a factory that adidas contracted with, and this is a case where the owner of the factory basically left the country overnight and stole the severance funds that he was required to pay by the Indonesian government,” he said. “In talking to adidas, ... we know that they paid their bills and paid

Conference

Center for Zebrafish Research, while Kennedy, a double major in philosophy and accounting, works Notre Dame's Center for Ethics and Culture.

"The conference was not only scientific, but at least for one of the days it addressed the ethical issues of stem cell research," Marton said.

Marton explained that one of the conference's chief goals was to discuss and raise awareness of the distinction between embryonic and adult stem cell research. While embryonic stem cells are taken from human embryos, adult stem cells can be extracted from the very patients needing therapy, meaning the ethical issues regarding destruction of embryos are not a concern.

"I think it's actually a problem today where people confuse the two," Marton said. "They sort of set themselves against all stem cell research where really they probably don't have anything against adult stem cell research and just don't realize the difference.

Springer said the difference in the sources of the cells is critical since adult stem cell therapy utilizes a patient's own cells.

"This gap between science and faith was totally bridged," Springer said. "You're not destroying life by any means, you're using a more organic, natural way to heal a patient ... and the Church supports it 100 percent."

Springer said she wishes the general public could understand the widespread potential for adult stem cells in regenerative medicine.

"Regenerative medicine and adult stem cell therapies — they're not only going to benefit those in the science field ... but I think they're going to benefit all of us," Springer said.

Springer and Kennedy both referenced multiple sclerosis patient

Roxane Beygi, who spoke at the conference about her diagnosis and treatment with adult stem cell therapy. Beygi was told "she had no chance of recovery," according to Kennedy. "Basically, she went from completely debilitated — couldn't walk, had a hard time feeding herself, clothing herself, couldn't speak, and was really struggling — and then underwent stem cell therapy," Springer said. "Apart from minor speech things, she was like you and me."

Although adult stem cell research does not bear the same ethical concerns as embryonic stem cell research, Kennedy said certain medical and ethical issues still need to be considered.

"It has the potential to heal so many people, but at the same time, when is it too much?" Kennedy said. "At what point do we draw the line? If the average human lifespan keeps increasing, it can't increase exponentially."

Marton said the Notre Dame students were among 26 student ambassadors invited to attend the conference. Springer said most of the students attend other Catholic universities including Georgetown, Villanova and Loyola.

"I felt very prepared by my education here to understand the talks and the meaning of what was being presented," Marton said.

Marton, Springer and Kennedy said learning about the potential benefits of adult stem cell research made them hope to continue researching novel therapies or, in Kennedy's case, to remain familiar with the biotech industry.

"This is actually a reality today," Kennedy said. "This isn't some thing that's conceived of in the future, it really is at the cusp of fundamentally changing medicine today."

Buyers seek ethical clothing

Associated Press

NEW YORK — You can recycle your waste, grow your own food and drive a fuel-efficient car. But being socially responsible isn't so easy when it comes to the clothes on your back.

Take Jason and Alexandra Lawrence of Lyons, Colo. The couple eat locally grown food that doesn't have to be transported from far-flung states. They fill up their diesel-powered Volkswagen and Dodge pickup with vegetable-based oil. They even bring silverware to a nearby coffeehouse to avoid using the shop's plastic utensils.

But when it comes to making sure that their clothes are made in factories that are safe for workers, the couple fall short.

"Clothing is one of our more challenging practices," says Jason Lawrence, 35, who mostly buys secondhand. "I don't want to travel around the world to see where my pants come from."

Last week's building collapse in Bangladesh that killed hundreds of clothing factory workers put a spotlight on the sobering fact that people in poor countries often risk their lives working in unsafe factories to make the cheap T-shirts and underwear that Westerners covet.

The disaster, which comes after a fire in another Bangladesh factory killed 112 people last November, also highlights something just as troubling for socially conscious shoppers: It's nearly impossible to make sure the clothes you buy come from factories with safe working conditions.

Very few companies sell clothing that's so-called "ethically made," or marketed as being made in factories that maintain safe working conditions. In fact, ethically made clothes make up a tiny fraction of 1 percent of the overall $1 trillion global fashion industry. And with a few exceptions, such as the 250-store clothing chain American Apparel Inc., most aren't national brands.

It's even more difficult to figure out if your clothes are made in safe factories if you're buying from retailers that don't specifically market their clothes as ethically made. That's because major chains typically use a complex web of suppliers in countries such as Bangladesh, which often contract business to other factories. That means the retailers themselves don't always know the origin of clothes when they're made overseas.

INSIDE COLUMN

To the class of 2013

Laura Coletti
Sports Writer

On the evening of Aug. 23, 2009, I sat beneath the arches of my new home, Howard Hall. I spoke into my cell phone to my best friend from home. “I already love it here,” I said.

Three years, eight months and one week later, I smile when I think about my 18-year-old self. She had no idea how much that love would grow.

Today, I and roughly 2100 other undergraduate students are watching the days, hours and seconds of our time at Notre Dame tick to a close. It’s the time of year for celebration, reflection and contemplation. It is also a time of year to give thanks to families, professors and others who have helped to shape our lives over the last four years.

I think a lot of times, one important group goes overlooked during the thank yous. My mom always taught me to handwrite my thank you notes, but since I cannot possibly pen hundreds of cards over the next two and a half weeks, I’m using the last Inside Column of my Observer career to thank my peers in Notre Dame’s class of 2013.

Lots of things define a college career. Academic success, athletic endeavors, internships, study abroad programs, volunteer efforts and scholarly accomplishments are all vital to an enriching college experience.

Here’s the thing, though. We all could have done those things somewhere else.

But we didn’t. We did them here and we did them with each other. To me, that is what really sets apart the Notre Dame experience — the incredible, wonderful people we encounter every single day on this campus.

I am a big believer in everything happening for a reason, and I think all of us who will be graduating on May 19th were thrown together four years ago for a reason greater than merely choosing Notre Dame. We all had a lot to learn from each other. We shared in each other’s highs and lows, made mistakes and memories together, loved, hated, fought, laughed, cried, ate, slept, studied, failed and succeeded together. Starting in two and a half weeks, we’re going to be seeing a lot less of each other. Make sure to take the time to let those who are important know how much they matter to you.

In May 2010, I sat in my home, Howard Hall, on the phone with that same friend. “What if someday it loses its magic?” I asked.

Thank you, classmates, for keeping the magic alive. When we process into the stadium three Sundays from now, take a moment to look around. Those who are responsible for your first 18 years of life will be in the stands. But those who are responsible for your last four years will be seated all around you. Sure, you’ll miss the football games, you’ll miss the parties, you’ll miss the campus events and you’ll probably even miss class. But none of that would have meant anything without the people you did it all with. So appreciate them, enjoy the last few moments with them and don’t forget to thank them.

Savor the present moment

Scott Boyle
The Sincere Seeker

“It’s time to leave.” Growing up, I heard these words almost daily as my parents tried to move my brothers and I from school to sporting events to rehearsals. To be frank, the Boyle household was more like an airport than a home during those early years — there was always someone coming and going, save, of course, for the brief layovers to refuel.

Our kitchen was the “control tower,” the command center for the head air traffic controllers (my parents) who coordinated complex travel schedules seven days a week to make sure my brothers and I got where we needed to be. “Refueling” was carefully orchestrated too. Water bottles were always being filled and free hands tossed around bananas that had to be eaten quickly in order to make the next practice or rehearsal on-time.

Although both my parents worked full-time jobs, they did their best to manage the ever changing “radar” that may be properly called our calendar. Tuesdays and Thursdays meant school, swim practice and piano lessons. Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays meant school, theater class, baseball and choir. Of course, cancellations, weather and coach/teacher schedules changed that weekday schedule frequently. Add to that the other games, errands, mass and chores that demanded time on weekends and you had a recipe for adventure!.

Although my parents made a herculean effort to ensure they were prepared and organized, we boys were a different story entirely. We liked to practice the ancient art of selective hearing. Precious minutes would tick by as we neglected our parents’ departure warnings and instead played more ‘NBA2K’ on our Sega Dreamcast before practices or caught some sleep on Sundays before mass. It wouldn’t be long then before the regular calls of “It’s time to leave” would turn to yells. The Sega would get unplugged and the sheets would be forcibly pulled back from our beds in order to get us out the door.

Those words, “It’s time to leave,” have a different sort of meaning for me now. No longer am I just preparing to leave the house for yet another practice or rehearsal. Now, I am preparing to leave Notre Dame, a place I have called home for the majority of five academic years and four summers.

As the end of this year draws near, I have found myself asking a lot of questions. “Who do I need to see?” “What do I need to do to make these last few weeks memorable?” “Is there anything I have left unfinished?”

I have found myself looking at the calendar more frequently, counting down the days until I no longer relate to campus in the same way. Time, it seems, is a luxury now.

Chances are all of us have had to leave something at certain points in our lives. Perhaps seniors are feeling similar sentiments as they prepare to graduate. Or perhaps those who are studying abroad are wondering how best to cherish these final moments before journeying away for a time. Perhaps some of us are worried about transitioning jobs, relationships or moving to a new city. No matter what stage of life we’re in or what we are facing, the future can be intimidating.

But Mitch Albom makes an interesting observation in regards to this fear in his novel “The Time-Keeper: “All around [us], timekeeping is ignored. Birds are not late. The dog does not check its watch. Deer do not fret over passing birthdays. Man alone measures time. Man alone chimes the hour. And, because of this, man alone suffers a paralyzing fear that no other creature endures. A fear of time running out.”

Perhaps, as Albom observes, the key to our futures lies actually within our present, in the birds, the dogs and the deer. What if we, like them, spent time savoring the present moments, the places and the people that surround us now? In doing this, we may discover — as Albom notes — that “the very next moment may be an answer to [our] prayer.” Our very next breath, conversation or encounter may present an opportunity that calms our fears and gives us the peace to follow our dreams. Albom writes, “To deny that is to deny the most important part of the future: hope.” What if we became men and women who lived with this hope in the future? Our futures might just end up looking beautiful too.

In the book, Father Time remarks, “God limits our days to make each one precious.” My time here at Notre Dame has been limited, but only so the education and formation I have received does not stay here, but travels with me to the world. We are called to be people of hope. We are called to model that hope to the world.

Flex points: countdown to zero

Matt Miklavic
The Maine Idea

As the flowers bloom and South Bend consumes its two-day quota of good weather, it is with sadness that we look to finals approaching which will bring to a close our year at Notre Dame. With them comes a myriad of questions. “When are my finals?” “Wait, I’m still in that class?” “Where am I storing everything this summer?” “Why does the band still play ‘Rumor Has It?’” And last but certainly not least, “How do I spend the rest of my flex points?”

As a remarkably diverse student body, it should come as no surprise students fall into a wide range of flex point positions. What follows is an attempt to highlight just a few of them.

The planner:
The planner budgeted out his flex points way back in January. While slightly disheartened his balance is $42.05 rather than the planned $43.71, he nevertheless knows exactly what he’s going to be buying, the total of his purchase and very possibly the name of the cashier he’ll be buying it from. He’ll want to correct the cashier for including tax on his purchase, but her casual smile and the prospect of a future SYR will keep him from saying anything. After his last final, he’ll walk to LaFortune, buy something and, despite having bombed the final, smile with great satisfaction that his balance is exactly $0.00.

The mooch:
At some point, the mooch decided they no longer cared. Inspired by their television, they declared it was indeed their money and they wanted it now. Having gone to Au Bon Pain two times a day for the first three months and having ended each night at Reckers, they find themselves without flex points or food, forced to attend random Career Center events in pursuit of free pizza. In drastic cases, the lack of purchasing power has led to these people declaring themselves free from Huddle delicacies such as soap, deodorant and toothpaste as well. Aside from smuggling out gummy worms in their backpacks and North Dining Hall burritos in their pockets (guy in the blue sweatshirt, you know who you are), their appetites are left to the charity of their friends as well as to anyone else who happens to be in line while they beg.

Best intentions:
This student started out as the planner. They thought they had it all figured out. They were on track through March, and then it all went wrong. Maybe their friends convinced them to buy Taco Bell for the entire section at 3 a.m. in a questionable state of sobriety. Maybe they had high school friends visiting who needed food, or they bought someone else’s food for them in an awkward display of courtship. Maybe there was an emotional night of section bonding, gossip and romantic comedies complete with Cherry Garcia and Phish Food — but enough about Siegfried. Whatever the cause, the planner’s best laid plans have fallen apart, and they’ve become just another member of the mooch legion.

The Last Supper:
The Last Supper is a special case for those among us who have been, to put it delicately, “asked” to take some time away from school. Incredibly, given the transgressions often responsible for mid-semester dismissals, their flex points haven’t been ravaged by the munchies. They have several hundred dollars left to spend, even after buying the ResLife committee lunch in a last-ditch attempt to sway their decision. So what does one do? Follow Jesus, of course, and participate in a Last Supper. In ceremonious fashion, you assemble a hungry horde and head to LaFortune. Once there, nothing is off limits. Even Burger King is allowed. In a race against time before the host’s identification card is deactivated, the group buys anything and everything. Unlike the following student, the point here is to spend money — avoid the quarter dogs.

The quarter dog connoisseur:
The quarter dog connoisseur (Q.D.C.) knows how to stretch a dollar. After coming to the realization they were going to run out of flex points around Easter Break, they transitioned to quarter dogs to the benefit of their flex points and the detriment of their lifespans. While not quite enjoying the four-month-old hot dogs, they find the taste palpable thanks to the price. That, and a whole lot of ketchup. To make things better, the Q.D.C. can now become part of the “Live Below the Line” movement, living on $1.50 a day. They will soon fashion a Viewpoint arguing the key to curing malnutrition in the third world lies with quarter dogs. The State Department will respond they’re trying to help those without food, not kill them.

The freshman:
Occasionally, a freshman will reach May without having developed a full understanding of how flex points work. As a result, they will still have $327.23, to the envy of everyone else. Luckily, this problem tends to work itself out. If their birthday falls toward the end of the year, they’ll just use their flex points to buy mixers and cups for their birthday bash. Their friends will create a seemingly clever dorm party title like “ReggaeTom” or “Katies from Chicago.” Problem solved. Should their birthday not align so perfectly, the upperclassmen in the section will give a helping hand, appropriating the flex points into section funds.

The kid that can’t count:
Despite being the star of their freshman finite mathematics class, they cannot subtract to save their life. Occasionally skipping the tens digit has caught up to them as they come up short at Starbucks. To make matters worse, the barista somehow butchered their name on the latte. Realizing they had only $87 to make it through the final six weeks, they sat down with their accounting major friend and were told some nonsense about budgeting. This conversation is a tragic foreshadowing of a discussion they will have with their parents roughly five months after graduation.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

The rules of existence in Zahm’s kingdom

Let’s get something straight here. Last week, several co-presidents of Knott Hall deemed it their right to claim a part of Notre Dame campus as the Knott Quadrangle. While this gesture is cute, it is based on the misguided presumption Knott has any authority on campus. While the story of your origins as Flanner Hall was nice to read, I see none of that coolness in the current Knott Hall. You can’t even decide upon one president, so don’t pretend all of the sudden your poorly elected triumvirate can start making statements that affect the rest of campus.

Beyond the uselessness of Knott Hall, there is a larger problem on campus: the idea any dorm has this authority but Zahm. Here are the facts. When people ask what dorm is the most infamous on campus, no one says Sorin College or Duncan Hall. When a former University president says anything, good or bad, that happens on campus begins in one dorm, he surely is not referring to Knott, Morrissey, Siegfried or Keough. Now, some dorms will claim otherwise. Keenan will claim it has a reason for existence, Keough will say “We have Father Pete” and Sorin will say “We have sweater vests.” Duncan: blazers. St. Edward’s: gentlemen/pretentiousness. O’Neill: “bro-ness.” Stanford: a fire-resistant fortress. Alumni: Wake Week. Morrissey: tower parties. Siegfried: trophies. But the fact is none of this justifies any of these dorms having any authority on campus. No dorm but Zahm is the one everyone loves to hate, the service-minded community that accepts all and does its best to help all in any way it can, both on- and off-campus.

Now I, like many “Zahmbies,” have many friends outside of Zahm. Some of my best friends are in the dorms I have listed, and none of this letter says anything to diminish their character or good works. This does not change the fact, however, that Zahm cannot be matched as a dorm. So go ahead, eager responders, and point out Zahm’s faults. Argue each dorm has a unique contribution (this has no bearing on the current double-standard debate) and claim your guy’s dorm deserves the title Zahm rightfully owns. Please claim spots on campus as your own, as Knott Hall has done. Just remember when you do, you are staking a claim in Zahm’s kingdom, a privilege we can revoke at will.

A big thanks to Notre Dame Food Services

As our senior year comes to a close, we just wanted to say an enormous thank you to all of the wonderful people that make South and North Dining Halls such havens of tranquility. From the greeters who always offer a pleasant smile and friendly hello to the lady working pasta stir fry in North Dining Hall (we’re going to miss hearing you ask “and anything else?”) to John and his mechanical chicken on wing night and to all the folks working behind the scenes. You have made our time at Notre Dame something special.

Often, all it takes is a warm greeting to lift someone’s day, and we have experienced that countless times in the dining halls. Plus the suggestions wall is always super funny in South Dining Hall and the food actually tastes great (unlike too many other schools our colleagues may attend).
So, thanks. We love you.

South by South Bend: Rockin' Downtown South Bend

By LIZZY SCHROFF
Scene Writer

Coachella, Bonnaroo, Lollapalooza, Sasquatch!, South by Southwest. Any of these names ring a bell? These multiday music festivals span across the United States from the farms of Manchester, Tenn. to the valley of Indio, Calif., boasting huge crowds and rocking music. But this year, you won't have to travel farther than downtown South Bend to enjoy a multi-artist music extravaganza. May 3 and May 4 marks the first ever South by South Bend (SXSb) music festival. Organized by residents of the South Bend area, this festival highlights local and traveling bands at a variety of venues in downtown South Bend.

Friday's schedule features folk rock performances at The Pool on W. Colfax Ave. These include Michigan-based Joshua Barton (who describes his music as "spacey folk tunes"), alternative rock group I AM BAND from Berrien Springs, Mich., and Lauryn Peacock from Philadelphia, Pa. Latin rock will be featured at the Boiler Room (the same location as The Pool), with artists Anival Fausto and Lalo Cura. Indie folk group Coed Pageant from Urbana, Ill. will play at Chickory Café on Jefferson Blvd. The party continues into the night with South Bend locals Dog & Pony at Club LaSalle.

Saturday's full-day lineup promises tons of artists at the Kizer Mansion on W. Washington Street and The Gridiron between South Bend Chocolate Cafe and DoubleTree Hilton Hotel. The lineup is comprised of folk artist Glad Fanny from Oswego, Ill., Chris Faero from Brooklyn, N.Y., "carp rock" South Bend duo The Rutabaga, and tons more.

The headlining show will take place at The State on S. Michigan Street on Saturday evening. Tickets can be purchased for $25 on Brown Paper Tickets. Proceeds support the 26 bands performing throughout the weekend. You can also choose to donate your ticket purchase to other community causes, such as the environment, children, and human rights. The show will include experimental-folk-rock group The Soil and The Sun from Grand Rapids, Mich. harpist and songwriter Timbre from Nashville, Tenn., and "afro-psychcountryprog" (why confine yourself to one genre?) band Infinite Buffalo from South Bend, among others. While the headlining show does require ticket purchase, all of the other venues will be accepting donations from attendees.

Throughout the weekend, you'll be able to choose your desired flavor of music — plugged in or acoustic — depending on the venue. Friday's show at The Pool, for instance, is the place to be if you are in the mood for the acoustic vibe. The festival presents the perfect occasion to support a burgeoning local and traveling music scene. An opportunity to be a part of South Bend's very first music festival (this is history making stuff, people!) and experience the musical creations of many talented artists is one that shouldn't be missed. If you've been itching for some culture and some new bands to put on your playlist, look no further than South By South Bend.

For more information on the weekend's festivities, check out the Facebook event page — SXSb 2013. You can also check out videos and MP3s of the bands playing at the festival. Parking will be free on both the streets and the garages downtown for the events. Rock on and support the music.

'WICKED' TO PLAY IN SOUTH BEND

By TESSA DEMERS
Scene Writer

Long before Dorothy, two young girls meet in the land of Oz. One — born with emerald green skin — is intelligent, fiery, and misunderstood. The other is beautiful, ambitious, and very popular. Wicked tells the story of how these two unlikely friends journey together to become the Wicked Witch of the West and her counterpart, Glinda the Good.

Based on the best-selling 1995 novel by Gregory Maguire, this musical has won 35 major honors, including a Grammy Award and three Tonys. Globally, Wicked has amassed nearly $2.9 billion in ticket sales and has been seen by 36 million people in its 9-year history.

This show is so popular in large part because of its amazing talent, its Tony Award-winning costumes, and its magnificent and captivating score by composer Stephen Schwartz (whose major works also include hit musicals such as Godspell and several Disney movies like Pocahontas and Enchanted). This show also provides a unique take on a "pre-Wizard of Oz" story, incorporating a fantastic message about how it is okay to be different and special, and that good things can often come out of bad ones.

Directed by two-time Tony Award winner Joe Mantello, and staged by another Tony winner, Wayne Cilento, this production will be hitting The Morris May 8th, and sticking around until May 19th.

"The two-week run is the longest that we have had in South Bend," Kathy Boes said, President of the Broadway Theatre League of South Bend, Inc., "and we expect an impressive influx of business at our local restaurants, hotels, retailers, and destinations."

I was lucky enough to be able to interview a member of the cast who has a special connection to the South Bend community and to Notre Dame. The sister of a 2006 graduate, and born and raised on ND football, Bridie Carroll is very excited to be back in the Bend, for the first time for a non-sporting event.

Having graduated with a B.F.A. in Musical Theatre from Boston Conservatory, a school with no athletics, or as Carroll said, "Their talents lie in other areas," she said loved every time she got the opportunity to visit campus and attend a football game. Carroll said she always wished she could come back to campus for something longer than a football weekend. Now, in the national tour of Wicked, she is finally getting her wish.

"There is something magical and spiritual about the campus," Carroll said. "I feel so grateful to come back and be able to give something back to the South Bend community because they, and Notre Dame, gave so much to me and my family over the years."

Because she has family friends in all aspects of Notre Dame, from administration staff to professors to members of the football team, Carroll said she sees the Notre Dame community as going a step beyond being a great university.

"Friends become family," she said. "It's a really unique school that can do that."

Although this will be her first time performing on a South Bend stage, she is no stranger to national tours. Though she appreciated that national tours offer an amazing opportunity to travel the country and perform a show that you love on stage every night, Carroll admitted that life on the road is sometimes difficult — and definitely "different."

"You live in hotels and you get one day off a week," said Carroll. "It's hard to have a traditional life. It's not a normal 9-to-5 job with the wife and kids and white picket fence. The cast and crew really become your family."

Another plus of working in theater is getting to portray a character quite different from yourself. On stage, you can be anyone you want to be, even if you only want to be that person for a couple hours and then go back to being yourself. Carroll, for example, plays one of Glinda's best friends.

"I get to play a girly girl and a mean girl," she said. "It's fun to be someone you're not."

Carroll also gets work with who's become a close friend to her over the past eight years: Hayley Podschun, who plays Glinda the Good. Sometimes, it seems, art really does imitate life, and vice versa.

For its script, its music, cast, set, costumes, and of course its message, Wicked is a great show to see when you have all that extra time during senior week — or to catch with your family over Commencement weekend. It is an experience that you will never forget.

Although the citizens of Oz all wear green, Carroll said she sometimes fantasizes about taking the production in a new direction for this particular tour stop. "I wish we could all come out in blue and gold. Go Irish!"

ND REFERENCES IN SHREK:

Fact or Fiction?

By CLAIRE STEPHENS
Scene Writer

The supposed Notre Dame references in the 2001 film “Shrek” that students enthusiastically claim to exist, in the face of the facts or reality, may be no more urban legend.

A key part of the myth is that members of the crew of “Shrek” are Notre Dame graduates, and they inserted five Notre Dame allusions into the film.

One, that Scottish chemistry professor Graham Lappin is the inspiration for Shrek’s character. Two, Lord Farquaad is named after the Carroll Quad (“far quad”) and three, the town of Duloc is named after the full title of the University, Notre Dame du Lac. The fourth reference is that the Duloc castle is modeled after the Hesburgh Library, and the fifth is that there is an outline of Main Building on the back of Shrek’s vest.

Firstly, Professor Lappin denied the connection between Shrek and himself.

“Shrek’s character is not based on me at all,” he said. “Mike Myers’ family have west-of-Scotland roots, and he used many of the idiosyncrasies of people from that part of the world (there are many) when he was on SNL. I do not know of any Notre Dame grads who have gone off to work for Dreamworks, and no one connected with Dreamworks has told me I am the inspiration for Shrek.”

The voice of Shrek was originally to be voiced by Saturday Night Live actor Chris Farley, who agreed to do voice work in 1996, but was unable to finish recording before his unexpected death in 1997. Jim Hill, in an article about the production of the film, wrote that Mike Myers agreed to take the role, but asked for the script to be completely reworked. Myers also decided he wanted to re-record all of Shrek’s dialogue with a Scottish accent, after he had already put years’ worth of work into the film.

Despite this evidence, some students still insist Lappin is the inspiration for Shrek, claiming Lappin looks and sounds exactly like Shrek.

The second and third myths would also need the influence of writers. Although the name Farquaad does look and sound like “Far Quad,” Notre Dame officials told Ed Greenberger of Fox28 that Carroll Quad has never been called “far quad,” not even decades ago. Fr. James Lewis, current rector of Carroll Hall, said he had no knowledge of such a reference and did not know of anyone who went to work for Dreamworks.

Furthermore, there is just as much if not more speculation that Lord Farquaad is meant to look like Disney chief Michael Eisner, a nemesis of Dreamworks producer Jeffrey Katzenburg. Peter Bradshaw of The Guardian and Sean Daly of the Washington City Paper further claim that “Farquaad” might be a way to pronounce “f***wad” in a children’s film.

The town of Duloc may also be more of a reference to Disney parks than to Notre Dame du Lac. Though they are pronounced the same, they are spelled differently, and the singing wooden puppet show when one enters Duloc is clearly a parody of the “It’s a Small World” ride. The Duloc song is in the same key and has the same beats per minute as “It’s a Small World.”

In the Duloc song, the lyrics “here we have some rules, let us lay them down,” are supposedly meant to allude to du Lac: A Guide to Student Life rulebook while “please keep off of the grass” supposedly refers to the rule to not to walk on the grass on “God Quad.”

A Notre Dame allusion that an animator might be able to insert is the structure of the Hesburgh Library. A visual comparison of the two shows the unlikelihood that the library inspired the castle. Though both are tall, rectangular buildings, this is the end of the similarities. The Duloc castle is a gray color, and its highest points at the top are the four corners sticking up. Hesburgh Library is a tan color, and its highest point is the flat rectangular portion on the top, with the sides of the building lower and further back than the front side with the mural on it.

The second visual allusion is the supposed outline of Main Building in the pattern on the back of Shrek’s vest. Though the large circle in the center of his vest with the smaller, thinner circle on top of it does look like the Golden Dome with Our Lady on top, production designer James Hegedus denied the likeness.

“There was no intent in the design of the vest to have it resemble the Golden Dome,” Hegedus said to Ed Greenberger of Fox28 in May 2010.

Though each of these references alone may not be strong enough evidence to believably allude to Notre Dame, together they might hold more weight. This is the final, most important part of the myth: Who in the large crew of Shrek is responsible for the references?

The legends about the Notre Dame graduates are most varied of all the myths. Some online sources said “many of the filmmakers” graduated from Notre Dame, while others said “the writer,” “three of the four writers,” “some of the animators,” and even “two writers, who lived in Carroll.” None of the assertions online list names.

A search for Dreamworks as a primary employer in the Notre Dame Alumni Directory gave only two results, neither of which are listed as crew members for “Shrek.” Additionally, none of the notable alumni listed on the Film, Television, and Theater (FTT) department’s page or the Art Department’s alumni page work for Dreamworks.

The names of all the writers, animators, producer and directors were searched individually in the Alumni Directory (as of December 2011), which lists alumni that have and have not registered online, as well as lists alumni considered active, inactive, or “lost”. For most names, there was no match, even when just the last name was searched. For the few name matches found, a closer look at the alumni and their employment history showed they were doctors, teachers, lawyers or engineers and did not work for Dreamworks or even in the film industry.

However, if a Notre Dame graduate went on to work for Dreamworks, especially the successful and beloved film “Shrek,” and even inserted references to Notre Dame into the film, why would the University not proudly claim them? Even if a filmmaker could not openly admit to inserting Notre Dame references, their names as crewmembers are publicly listed online, wouldn’t students, peers, friends, faculty, or staff recognize their names?

Where might these rumors have started and how do they spread? Professor Lappin said the rumors about him as the inspiration for Shrek first came to his attention eight or nine years ago when a student in his general chemistry class asked him to say “donkey.”

Donald Crafton, FTT professor teaching “Animation Cinema” next semester and author of “Before Mickey: The Animated Film 1898-1928,” said the references are an example of an urban legend that got online and from there could not be stopped.

“It’s just not local,” Crafton said. “If, however, what one hears about the campus tours is accurate, the [tour] guides also have contributed to its spreading. An alumna of Notre Dame who works at Dreamworks Animation told me specifically that no references to her alma mater were intentionally sneaked into ‘Shrek.’”

The complete, 20-page script given to student tour guides (as of December 2011) does not list any of the “Shrek” references, but does in all capital letters deny that South Dining Hall is the inspiration for The Great Hall in the “Harry Potter” series. Senior tour guide Clara Ritger said the tour guides often don’t use the master script, but she knows many tour guides who include the “Shrek” references in the tour.

Though it is still possible that a Notre Dame fan who was very familiar with the University (and not just the football team) inserted these references, it will take even more digging. As for the myths, any truth in Notre Dame alums inserting specifically Notre Dame references seems very highly unlikely, if not completely untrue.

THE KICKBACK

Andrew Gastelum
Editor-In-Chief

Now that school is ending, it makes sense to have our final kick-back be about an artist who started his career because of school.

In his senior year of high school, Chance The Rapper was suspended 10 days for marijuana possession. But his suspension gave him the push to pursue his dreams in rap, resulting in his first mix tape “10 Day.”

Twenty thousand downloads later, the Chicago rapper opened for Childish Gambino on his “Camp” tour, rocked South By Southwest twice and notched a spot at this summer’s Lollapalooza.

Oh, and he’s only 19 years old.

Everything about this kid is unique, from his squeaky, high-pitch voice to his soothing amalgamation of jazz instrumentation and his congenial storytelling of everyday life reminiscent of 90s rap.

And it all seems to come together in “Acid Rap,” Chance The Rapper’s highly anticipated sophomore release.

“Acid Rap” represents the reason we should all love rap: to hear a good story. There’re no typecast club bangers, hard-hitting 808s or rapid-fire high-hats. In fact, it’s a lot of trumpet blaring, piano melodies and acid jazz grooves, and it sits so well with any mood.

Chance gets a little help from his friends this time around, including TDE’s Ab-Soul, Action Bronson, Childish Gambino and even Twista.

The mix tape’s highlights come from the uplifting, meta “Favorite Song” feat. Childish Gambino and the wall-knocking, All-of-the-Lights-horn-heavy “Smoke Again” feat. Ab-Soul.

But the real eye-opener to Chance The Rapper’s true potential rests in the melancholy ubi-sunt of “Acid Rain,” an ode to an acid trip that helps him cope with the murder of a close friend.

If you’re looking for any comparisons, it’s as if A Tribe Called Quest met the old “Through the Wire” Kanye West. Yup, I know it’s high praise, but all it needs is a Chance.

SPORTS AUTHORITY

Because it's the Cup, that's why

Jack Hefferon
Sports Writer

I've been trying for three years to win one of those damned RecSports champion t-shirts. I already have too many t-shirts to wear, and it usually has some ridiculous design or color scheme on it that would make it a back-of-the-rotation shirt at best. But that shirt represents the one shining moment when you stood on top of the world and defeated all comers to declare yourself as the greatest — or at least more sober than the other broomball squad on the ice.

It's the same with the Masters. In almost every situation, a green sport jacket is nothing more than an aggressive fashion statement or a great $12-find at your local thrift shop. But when it's emblazoned with the logo of Augusta National Golf Club and presented in Butler Cabin, it represents an elite fraternity of those who have faced golf's greatest test and passed. It's unique, an icon unto itself and an unmistakable symbol of history and greatness — everything a trophy needs.

And that's why it's the second-best trophy in sports.

The Masters green jacket only claims silver on my list of best trophies, and that's because of a very special piece of silver in its own right. Because when it comes down to it, nothing compares to the Stanley Cup.

The Cup was commissioned by Lord Stanley of Preston, Governor General of Canada, in 1892, and has been awarded nearly every year since then to North America's best hockey club. Its charm is in its history and tradition, which really can be attributed to the fact that a new Cup isn't made every year, unlike the trophies of America's other three major leagues.

Admittedly, there is some novelty to having multiple championship trophies in your case. But compared to holding and having your name carved into the Cup that's been held by Wayne Gretzky, Bobby Orr, Gordie Howe and Lord Stanley himself? That idea is priceless.

The league has differentiated itself by centering its playoffs around the pursuit of the Cup. It's not the "NHL Playoffs," it's the "Stanley Cup Playoffs." Nobody ever brags they've won 27 Commissioner's Trophies or a dozen Larry O'Brien Trophies — awarded to the MLB and NBA champions, in the likely case that, like me, you didn't know.

In fact, for the past several years, the NHL has marketed its playoffs with one simple phrase: "Because it's the Cup."

And after a team wins the Cup, the traditions really take hold. Every player takes the Cup for a lap around the ice, then gets a personal day with it during the following year. The Cup has been in parades, fallen through whitewater rapids and often functioned as a morning cereal bowl for a player — each of which only adds to its mystique.

Most frequently though, a player will take the Cup back to his hometown as a win to be shared with everyone that helped him eventually become an NHL champion. Small Canadian towns that wouldn't miss a beat in an eight-foot blizzard come to a standstill when the Cup comes to town, and even the toughest have been reduced to tears at the sight of it. It's not only tough to touch the trophy, as it travels with specially designated bodyguards, but foolish to even try, as anyone who lifts the Cup without winning it is cursed to never win it.

So I'll have to stay away from sports' greatest trophy for the time being, at least until I learn how to skate and win it for real.

In the meantime, I guess I'll just settle for a RecSports t-shirt.

Slumping Bruins, Maple Leafs meet in first round

Associated Press

Forget about the way the Bruins and Maple Leafs stumbled into the playoffs. Pay no attention to how Boston has dominated Toronto in recent seasons.

That's what both teams will be trying to do when they meet in the playoffs Wednesday night for the first time since 1974.

"If things would've been going all our way, we would've been downplaying it the same way," Bruins center Patrice Bergeron said Tuesday.

The Bruins missed a chance to finish second in the Eastern Conference by losing seven of their last nine games. The Maple Leafs dropped four of their last six regular-season games and nine of 10 to Boston over the past two seasons. They've also lost 11 of their last 13 at TD Garden.

"I'd expect we're going to get a Boston Bruins team that's different than the last two weeks of their season and I'd expect we're going to get a higher brand of hockey from our club also," Maple Leafs coach Randy Carlyle said.

Both teams are likely to get key scorers back from upper-body injuries — Nathan Horton for Boston and Tyler Bozak for Toronto. Horton missed five games and Bozak sat out two.

"I think we're playing a little bit better. We're just not scoring," Horton said. "We get our chances but we didn't put the teams away and we just gave them a chance to stick around. That's how they come back and that's in the past now. We don't want to think of that."

The Bruins' 131 goals were eighth in the conference and they scored only 18 in their last nine games. The Leafs were fifth with 145 goals and now expect Bozak, who had 12 goals and 16 assists this season, to be ready for the opener of Toronto's first playoff series in nine years.

"When you have a player that takes all the important faceoffs for you, that's the first place you miss him," Carlyle said. "Bozie is a real smart hockey player. He knows where to be on the ice. The puck kind of follows him around and his game is one where he does a lot of the little things that aren't noticed, but you notice them when he's not there."

One focal point will be former Bruins player Phil Kessel and Boston's Tyler Seguin, two top young forwards. Boston traded Kessel to Toronto in September 2009 for three draft choices, two of whom turned out to be first-rounders: Seguin and rookie defenseman Dougie Hamilton. Both have played key roles this season.

In 16 games against Toronto, Seguin has 10 goals and six assists. Kessel has fared much worse against Boston with three goals and six assists in 22 games — and he's had to endure the jeers of Bruins fans.

"They are obviously going to be loud, probably going to be giving it to Phil a little bit," Bozak said. "We're used to that when we go there, but it might be a little bit more upscale this time around."

Kessel probably will have more problems with a Bruins defense that allowed just 109 goals, second fewest in the East.

But the Maple Leafs became a bit tougher themselves against opposing puck handlers as the season progressed.

"I think they've improved a lot really on their forecheck, on the way that they pressure," Bergeron said. "They really come hard, and they're in your face, and they're a pretty physical team. So we're expecting that."

Boston missed a chance to be seeded second in the conference when it lost 4-2 to the Ottawa Senators in the regular-season finale Sunday. That allowed Montreal to take that spot while the Bruins slipped to fourth. The Maple Leafs earned the fifth seed.

"It doesn't matter if we finished first or eighth," Boston goalie Tuukka Rask said. "You make the playoffs, you've still got to start with a clean sheet. And I think nobody's even talked about the regular season anymore. We're focused on the playoffs."

With Smith's return, Knicks look to advance

Associated Press

GREENBURGH, N.Y. — J.R. Smith may have altered a series with one poor decision. He certainly forced his midweek plans to change.

When he dropped Boston's Jason Terry with an elbow to the chin late in Game 3 on Friday night, Smith earned a suspension that left the New York Knicks without their No. 2 scorer during the regular season for Game 4 on Sunday.

The Knicks didn't have enough offense without him, losing 97-90 in overtime as Terry, not the Sixth Man of the Year, hit the big shots off the bench.

Had Smith been available, perhaps this series would already be over.

"It would've been," Smith said Tuesday. "I would've been playing golf today."

Instead, he was practicing for Game 5.

The Knicks will host it Wednesday, their second attempt to close out their first series victory since 2000.

"We want to end it," leading scorer Carmelo Anthony said. "We came this far, did our job at home first two games, did our job on the road, got one on the road. We've got the opportunity to end it here on our home court."

The Knicks won the first three games, holding the Celtics to an average of 75 points, before Boston broke out — sort of — on Sunday. The Celtics scored 54 points in the first half and led by 20 early in the third quarter before their offensive struggles returned, and they were limited to just 30 points in the third and fourth quarters.

Clean up those bad stretches, and the Celtics think they can keep climbing out of the mess they created for themselves.

"There's that one quarter where we have mental lapses," forward Paul Pierce said. "They pick up the energy. They pick up the defense, and they have us on our heels, so we have to be cautious of that."

The Knicks had their own problems Sunday, shooting 34 percent from the field and making just 7-of-30 3-pointers (23 percent). Anthony, perhaps feeling pressure to force things with Smith unavailable, scored 36 points but was 10-of-35, missed all seven 3-point attempts and committed seven turnovers.

Smith averaged a career-best 18.1 points during the regular season, and his recognition as the NBA's top reserve was as much a credit to his improved maturity and decision-making as it was to his scoring streaks.

But those qualities went missing Friday when Smith threw his elbow into Terry with the Knicks 7:06 away from wrapping up an easy victory. Coach Mike Woodson appeared to be lecturing Smith before he left the court, and they had another talk Sunday.

"We had a major discussion before he left Boston to come to New York," Woodson said. "J.R.'s in a good place. We're fine with J.R."

But the Knicks' offense wasn't. Though Raymond Felton continued his excellent series with 27 points Sunday, the Knicks' bench that had dominated Boston's managed only seven points. Terry scored 18 by himself.

"We missed 18 points the other night and still put ourselves in position to win the ballgame," Woodson said. "J.R. is a big piece to the puzzle and I hope he's learned his lesson, and we've got to move on with it and he's got to be ready to go tomorrow night."

No team has blown a 3-0 lead in the NBA playoffs, so the Knicks remain confident, especially after rallying to take a fourth-quarter lead Sunday. The Celtics would send the series back to Boston for a Game 6 on Friday with a victory, and they know the only way they can get it is by coming out with the same energy they had Sunday.

"Without a doubt. We have to bring it. It's the only way we have a chance to win the game. We just have to play all out," forward Jeff Green said.

"We can't go in with the same outlook (as Game 4), because I'm pretty sure they're going to have different schemes on how they're going to attack the pressure situations and how we came at Melo."

A strong game from Smith would be the easiest way for the Knicks to address that, but they insist he doesn't owe them one after being forced to watch Game 4 from the hotel.

"We all owe each other a good game tomorrow," Woodson said. "It's not on just J.R.'s head. Everybody's got to play well to come out of here with a win."

New York guard J.R. Smith dunks on Boston forward Jeff Green in the Knicks' 90-76 win in Game 3. Smith was suspended for Game 4, but will return for Game 5.

Nats' Strasburg irritates nerve

Washington starting pitcher Stephen Strasburg delivers a pitch during the Nationals' 3-1 home loss to the Atlanta Braves.

Associated Press

ATLANTA — Washington Nationals pitcher Stephen Strasburg may have irritated a nerve in his right arm using an electrical stimulation machine.

The machines are used by athletes to build strength and are attached with adhesive electrodes. Manager Davey Johnson said the device could have been placed too close to a nerve in Strasburg's pitching arm, leading to discomfort in Monday night's start against the Atlanta Braves.

Johnson said the Nationals do not expect Strasburg to have continued problems with the irritated nerve but it was too early to determine whether Strasburg will make his next scheduled start Saturday at Pittsburgh. The manager wants to see how the right-hander throws in a bullpen session.

"I think it will settle down by the time he throws his side," Johnson said. "I think Strasburg feels a lot better about it. So do I."

Strasburg frequently shook his right arm while pitching six innings and allowing two runs in the Nationals' 3-2 loss Monday night.

Johnson said after the game Strasburg "doesn't look right to me." The manager said he was concerned Monday because Strasburg struggled with his control while walking four batters and shook his arm so often between pitches.

"He always does this a little bit, but it was so pronounced yesterday, it really worried me," Johnson said Tuesday. "But he feels all right about it so I feel all right about it."

Asked after the game why he was shaking his arm, Strasburg said "You just try to stay loose."

Strasburg insisted Monday "I'm not missing my next start. I'll tell you that right now."

He had lost a career-worst four straight starts before pitching six innings and getting a no-decision Monday night. He is 1-4 with a 3.13 ERA.

Strasburg struck out the side in the sixth inning, giving him eight strikeouts for the game.

The right-hander was examined by a doctor after the game but the Nationals said he was not given additional tests Tuesday.

"The way he finished off the sixth was pretty impressive, and the doctor didn't think anything was wrong, so that's good," Johnson said.

Washington held out right fielder Jayson Werth on Tuesday, a day after Werth crumpled to the ground when he fouled a ball off his left foot in the eighth inning. He completed his at-bat and was replaced in right field by Roger Bernadina in the bottom half.

Werth said he also struggled with a tight right hamstring on Monday night.

"I'm not too worried about it," he said of his injuries.

Irish set sights on team title at Big East meet

GRANT TOBIN | The Observer

By LAURA COLETTI
Sports Writer

The Irish will travel to Piscataway, N.J., this weekend on the quest for two crowns at the Big East championship meet.

Notre Dame used the majority of the regular-season outdoor meets to build and prepare in order to make sure it peaks during the postseason. Sophomore sprinter Chris Giesting is confident both the men and women are ready to compete to their full potential.

"I think everyone is very prepared for the Big East meet," Giesting said. "The coaches have worked us all year long to get us ready for this one meet, so we just have to trust our training at this point. We've been running hard every meet in different events to get us extra work throughout the year. The regular-season meets are seen as training for the Big East meet because we all compete our best at the conference meet and max out our bodies."

The Irish expect both sides have the potential to come away from the meet as champions, and a number of athletes seem well positioned to perform well individually. During the indoor season, senior middle distance runner Rebecca Tracy, junior sprinter Michelle Brown, sophomore hurdler Jade Barber and junior sprinter Pat Feeney all won their events. Senior middle distance runners J.P. Malette and Jeremy Rae were both injured during the indoor championships and are looking to make up for that missed opportunity.

In the multi-events, sophomore Carly Loeffel is expected to perform well for the women and senior Ted Glasnow should place well for the men.

This is the only postseason event that is team-oriented, so Notre Dame's members are hoping to share success with each other.

"This is really the big team event for us all year. Winning this is the last big thing we do as a team," Giesting said. "Anything after this is mainly individual performances as everyone tries to qualify individually for nationals. The coaches have been telling us all week that we have a great shot at winning the meet on both the men's and women's side. It will definitely be close but the coaches have emphasized the importance of every single point, because every point matters in this type of meet."

Connecticut is expected to be the biggest competition for the Irish. On the men's side, for the past decade, either Notre Dame or UConn has won the conference meet. On the women's side, UConn placed second in this year's indoor meet, and will be looking to unseat the Irish in the outdoor rematch.

Action will begin this Friday and will continue through Sunday in Piscataway, N.J.

"We need to continue to work," she said. "We can't let our guard down because in the end, defense wins championships."

It will be hard for the Irish not to look past the Broncos to Big East rival Louisville this weekend, she said.

"[Louisville] is the climax of the regular season," O'Donnell said. "The winner of this series clinches the conference title."

This weekend will also celebrate the senior class, as Sunday's game will be accompanied by festivities to honor the class of 2013.

"As a class we want to leave a legacy as a group who day-in and day-out represented Notre Dame softball in its entirety," O'Donnell said.

The Irish will be able to stay focused before this weekend, though, because their game today against the Broncos is crucial to helping their stock in order to qualify for the NCAA tournament, O'Donnell said.

"We haven't even addressed Louisville yet because we are going day by day and are focused on Western Michigan," she said.

Game time in Kalamazoo, Mich., this afternoon is 4:00 p.m.

MEN'S GOLF | THIRD PLACE

Irish finish last season in Big East

By CASEY KARNES
Sports Writer

Notre Dame posted its best results in weeks and finished third at the Big East tournament on Watson Course in Orlando, Fla.

The Irish shot par for the weekend to accumulate a cumulative score of 864 and trailed only South Florida (858) and St. Johns (862). While round three was the best for the Irish, their round one performance of 288 was enough to give them the lead heading into the second day. A tough second round shattered the momentum from day one, however, when the Irish had trouble in the short game.

Irish coach Jim Kubinski was disappointed by Notre Dame's 296 score in the second round, but praised his team's recovery for day three.

"We gave away several short putts over the tournament, which ultimately cost us a win," Kubinski said. "Great job of moving on from a tough day, keeping the confidence high and playing some inspired golf. I thought the guys showed some of that Fighting Irish spirit today."

Notre Dame's golfers didn't merely rebound on day three, they posted their best score of the tournament, 280. Yet even after leading the pack on both day one and three, Notre Dame's poor round two kept it behind both South Florida and St. Johns. Still, Kubinski was proud of his team's improved play this week after a subpar season.

"The guys did a great job today of something I call trusting aggressively. The most important thing in our game is committing to the shot you're about to play," Kubinski said. "Our team did a great job of that today. It's easy to talk about, as we have all season, but doing so is something that was great to see."

The Irish had success individually as well, placing two golfers in the top five finishers. Freshman Cory Sciupider finished in third place — the highest freshman finish ever at Big East tournament according to Kubinski — by shooting a 211, and junior Niall Platt came in fifth with a score of 214. Freshman Zach Toste notched an impressive debut in his first start, tying Irish senior Paul McNamara for 25th place. Junior Andrew Lane rounded out the Irish lineup by finishing in 55th place.

Kubinski said he was impressed with his freshmen golfers' performances, especially considering the heightened pressure of the Big East tournament.

"Our freshmen made this run possible. Cory finishing third is extremely significant. His ceiling is very, very high. I loved the way he handled his emotions today, better than at any point this season," Kubinski said. "Zach came out pretty amped in round one, lots of adrenaline. He settled in after that. He played as well in round two as today but putted much better today. I'm excited about the next three years for each."

Despite the Irish improvement in this tournament, they came up just short of the win, ending their season. According to Kubinski, his team has been defined by perseverance all season, and its hard work finally paid off in the Big East tournament.

"I'm really proud of our guys. We started the season with a very young team, having graduated 60 percent of our lineup last May," Kubinski said. "This team kept learning and never lost belief in themselves."

With the third-place finish in the Big East tournament, the Irish conclude their season.

resulted in us playing too much defense and we lost our discipline at that point in trying to create some plays."

Despite the result, Corrigan said he's confident and indicated he does not think Saturday's game tells much about the potential outcome of Thursday's rematch.

"I'm not worried about [Saturday's performance]," he said. "It was a poor performance. We're not used to playing that way but we're certainly not anticipating playing that way again."

The loss prevented the Irish from earning the No. 1 seed in the tournament and instead dropped them to the No. 3 seed, forcing a rematch with No. 2-seed Syracuse. In the other semifinal, tournament host and No. 1-seed Villanova will face No. 4-seed Georgetown.

The Irish defeated the Wildcats (6-7, 5-1) on April 20 and the Hoyas (6-8, 3-3) on April 14. Notre Dame will face the winner of Georgetown and Villanova on Saturday in the Big East championship if it defeats the Orange.

"I hope we have the opportunity to play one of them on [Saturday]," Corrigan said. "We've played them both before and both within the last few weeks. So as far as we're concerned, it's great to know our preparation will be relatively easy for Saturday if we can get through Thursday."

The Irish face Syracuse at 4:30 p.m. on Thursday in the Big East semifinals. The Big East championship is scheduled for noon Saturday.

well for us."

After scoring one run in the third, the Chippewas (19-23, 8-10 MAC) kept things close by scoring runs in the fifth and sixth innings off junior reliever Donnie Hissa, making the game 6-3. Freshman right-hander David Hearne took over for Hissa in the sixth and worked his way out of a jam to end the Central Michigan rally.

Senior outfielder Charlie Markson gave Notre Dame an insurance run in the top of the ninth inning to make the score 7-3 before junior closer Dan Slania shut things down in the bottom half to secure the Irish victory.

"I thought we swung the bats well, in particular early," Aoki said. "I thought overall it was a good effort from us."

Nobody in the Notre Dame lineup, or the country for that matter, has been hotter than Mancini, who recorded his seventh straight multi-hit game against Central Michigan.

Mancini, who was 3-for-4 Tuesday, was named Big East Player of the Week and the National Collegiate Baseball Writers Association Hitter of the Week on Monday after his weekend performance against Connecticut.

Notre Dame returns to action tonight at home against Eastern Michigan. The original matchup between the Irish and Eagles (20-21, 9-9 MAC) was postponed due to inclement weather on April 10.

Eastern Michigan lost two of three against Central Michigan last weekend. Its lineup is led by junior outfielder Sam Ott, whose .352 batting average and 37 RBIs are tops among Eagles hitters.

Sophomore right-hander Matt Ternowchek will start for Notre Dame today. Ternowchek is 4-3 with a 5.03 ERA.

Tonight's game is Notre Dame's fifth in six days. Aoki stressed the importance of his team continuing to play well despite the demanding schedule.

"We're down a little bit on pitching right now," Aoki said. "We need Matt Ternowchek to go out there and pitch well. We'll sort of piece together the [bullpen] and then go from there ... It's important for us to come out and play at a high level to help keep us moving forward."

First pitch between the Irish and Eagles is scheduled for 5:35 p.m. at Frank Eck Stadium.

Irish get another shot against 'Cuse

WEI LIN | The Observer

Occasionally, two college lacrosse teams will face each other twice in a season — once in the regular-season and once in a conference tournament or NCAA tournament game. Rare are the circumstances when the initial meeting and the rematch are separated by less than a week.

But that will be the case when No. 5 Notre Dame faces No. 3 Syracuse in a Big East semifinal Thursday in Villanova, Pa.

The Irish (10-3, 4-2 Big East) will look for revenge against the Orange (11-3, 5-1) after they dropped a 10-4 contest to Syracuse on Saturday at the Konica Minolta Big City Classic in East Rutherford, N.J.

Irish coach Kevin Corrigan said he is glad to have another crack at the Orange so quickly.

"To be honest, I'm excited to have that opportunity," Corrigan said. "As to the way we played the other day, we're anxious to get back on the field and get back to playing good, smart, solid lacrosse that we've played pretty much all year but did not play last week in New Jersey."

The then-No. 1 Irish held a 3-1 halftime lead Saturday and were tied 4-4 after three quarters, before Syracuse outscored Notre Dame, 6-0, in the final 15 minutes. Even with the halftime advantage, Corrigan said the Irish played poorly the entire contest, not just the fourth quarter.

"We did not play well the whole game," he said. "We did some good things defensively, but we'd stop them and then give them the ball back. We'd get down to the offensive end and then turn the ball over. That was just the culmination of four quarters of lacrosse that

Notre Dame took to the road Monday night and continued its winning streak with another solid offensive performance, defeating Central Michigan 7-3.

The Irish (27-16, 7-8 Big East) have now won five straight games and eight of their last nine.

"We all understand how important it is that we keep moving forward and keep playing well," Notre Dame coach Mik Aoki said. "Coming down to the tail end of the year, every game is critically important for us."

The Notre Dame offense jumped on Central Michigan starter Jimmy McNamara early. Junior first baseman Trey Mancini opened the second inning with a double off the left field wall and was driven in two batters later on a triple by sophomore designated hitter Phil Mosey. Freshman short-stop Lane Richards brought in Mosey with an RBI of his own, and after two innings, the Irish led 2-0.

In the third inning, the Irish offense kept rolling. Mancini and sophomore outfielder Ryan Bull hit back-to-back RBI singles, and an error on Bull's hit allowed another Notre Dame run to score, making it 5-0. After McNamara left the game with two outs in the third, Mosey came to the plate and ripped an RBI double, making the score 6-0 after

The Irish handled Eastern Michigan on Tuesday 5-3 and now look toward a road tilt against Western Michigan this afternoon.

Notre Dame (38-11, 17-2 Big East) jumped out to an early lead in the first inning and forced the Eagles (15-30-1, 5-12 MAC) into a 2-0 hole in the third. The Eagles responded in the top of the fourth inning, when junior pitcher Laura Winter gave up a solo home run to Western Michigan second baseman Amanda Stanton.

Some small-ball and a single from Irish sophomore designated player Cassidy Whidden scored freshman pinch runner

Carly Piccinich from third base to extend the Irish lead to 3-1 in the bottom of the fourth. Notre Dame helped its cause with a solo home run by junior short-stop Chloe Saganowich that made it 4-1. Later that inning, senior first baseman Jackie Bowe laced a double to right center field with two outs and moved to third on a wild pitch. Senior right fielder Kelsey Thornton hit an infield single to score Bowe before the inning ended at 5-1.

Although the Eagles were able to tack on two more runs, the Irish pulled out the win. Senior pitcher Brittany O'Donnell said there was a lot the team was able to take away
