
Edmund Glade is Dead.

Edmund Glade, os Sophomore Hall, died in St. Joseph's Hospital Friday evening, after an illness of only a few hours. Although death came swiftly, it did not find him unprepared. He received the Sacraments of the Church devoutly and fervently, three priests were with him through the evening, he was resigned and cheerful, conscious till a few moments before his death. It was another beautiful example of the mercy and loving-kindness of God, witnessed so often in the death of a Notre Dame student.

Your Prayers Are Now in Order.

Tomorrow morning at 6:30 there will be a requiem Mass in the church for the repose of his soul. It goes without saying that your prayers and Communion will be given generously; it is always a mark of Divine favor for a student to die among his classmates, who are sure to pray earnestly for him. And for the consolation of his bereaved parents -- he was an only child -- a spiritual bouquet will be made up. Please check below what you care to offer for their encouragement and for the repose of his soul:

The Lesson of Sudden Death.

When death comes suddenly, and finds one fully prepared, its lesson is intended for those who need it. There are many students here who did not make the Mission; there are even those who scoffed at the Mission. This death is God's Mission.

There have been other sudden deaths in recent years among the students. On Holy Thursday a year ago, Wm. Dockman was killed by a freight train. He had received the Sacraments a few days before, and he had the ministrations of a priest again before he passed away. John Culhane was killed instantly by an accidental shot only a few years ago. He had received Holy Communion the day before; and like Dockman, he was a fine type of Catholic boy. Leo Owens took sick on the dance floor at the Junior Prom about six years ago. He fainted when he reached the hospital, and never recovered consciousness. He had received Holy Communion that morning. Bertram Hancock, a former student, the sole heir to his father's millions, was killed instantly during the Santa Barbara earthquake last June. Wick Holony was killed in front of Hancock's house a few years before. He had been at confession a week before, and at Holy Communion that morning. Narry Nichols was killed two years ago, ten minutes after he had left the confession on Saturday afternoon.

Could sudden death find you unprepared?
