PAUL I. FENLON. A.B. '19, LL.B. '20, M.A. '22. Notre Dame, Ind. Retired (since December 31, 1961) Professor of English at the University, where he had been teaching since 1920. Teacher, counselor and friend of thousands of Notre Dame men, his room at Sorin Hall has become an unofficial alumni headquarters on campus. Unmarried,

Paul has devoted his life to sharing his knowledge of life and letters with students through more than 40 years.

Born in Blairsville, Pa., of two Irish parents (two sisters attended St. Mary's College across the highway), Paul has supplemented his Notre Dame degrees with graduate work at Harvard and advanced training in creative writing at writers' conferences such as the famous Breadloaf, conducted at Vermont's Middlebury College. Introducing generations of freshmen to college English, he specialized in English and American literature, especially the novel and short story. He particularly delighted in exposing Engineering and Commerce (now Business Administration) students to the grandeur of superior fiction. For many years he served as assistant dean of the College of Arts and Letters.

A one-man prep school committee, Paul has personally influenced the decision of dozens of young men to attend Notre Dame and has given freely of his time to advise students and help them with their problems.

Like most of the "old guard" teachers, he has always carried too heavy a load of teaching hours to give much time to writing for publication. A writer of book reviews, he is still collecting material for his magnum opus, a book he has projected for many years. His affiliations include the American Assn. of University Professors and the Indiana Club. A long list of hobbies includes bridge, travel and, of course, chronic bibliomania.
