Only two changes

Student govt budget passed

by Pete McHugh
Staff Reporter

After four and a half hours of hearings and deliberation, the Board of Commissioners of the Student Government put the final touches on the Student government budget late last night.

The final form of the budget remains largely unchanged from its original version first offered by the Finance Committee two weeks ago. The only changes involve the appropriations to the Hall President's Council, the New Frontier Scholastic Society and Ujamma, the black student society.

$5,100 was appropriated the Hall life Fund for hall improvements. This is $750 more than the original appropriation. And it will be administered by a special sub-committee of the Board of Commissioners.

The budgets of Ujamma and the new frontier Scholastic Society were separated at their request. Ujamma will receive $2,500 and the New Frontier Scholastic Society was allotted $400.

Elsewhere, the funds for An Toastal were given to the Hall President's Council to administer, instead of directly to the hall as previously suggested. These funds were reduced from the original suggestion of $3,250 to $2,000 largely because the cost of a free concert was transferred to the Social Commission.

Two Groups Split

The New Frontier Scholastic Society and the Hall President's Council raised objections to the Student Government Financial Committee's budget recommendations last night at a meeting of the Board of Commissioners. The Board of Commissioners consists of the Student Life Council, HPC President Butch Ward, and Student Government Vice-president Dennis Etienne.

The New Frontier Scholastic Society, seeking recognition as an academic organization not connected with the Society of Ujamma, asked for separate funding. Ray Turner, spokesman for the New Frontier Scholastic Society, said "It seems as if the Student government wants one black organization on campus."

Board of Commissioners: listened to club gripes for over four hours and finally passed a basically unchanged budget

Citing the presence of some whites at their last meeting, Turner stated, "We don't represent the black community." The society asked for money for guest speakers and for other community services. "Because we are a separate organization, we expect to be funded separately," Turner said.

Mike Marget, Student Government Treasurer and a member of the Finance Committee, responded to Turner's accusations by referring to his committee's decision. He said that the committee felt that Ujamma and the New Frontier Scholastic Society essentially provide the same service to the campus community.

The Board decided they did not.

Ujamma responds

The Society of Ujamma also complained about the budget recommendations. Bob McCready and Michael Crittenden, representing Ujamma, called for more money to pay for the many speakers they plan to present. Among these speakers are Angela Davis, Sonia Sanchez, and Julian Bond.

In regard to charges that Ujamma exercises black racism, McCready said the purpose of the club was to "create unity between both black and white students." He stressed, however, that there is a need to "provide some kind of social atmosphere for the black students."

some failed

HPC Executive Coordinator Steve

Jeselnick presented a plan to issue all money allocated to halls through the HPC. His proposal called for a sizeable increase in the Finance Committee's allocation.

Several groups failed to change the budget from its original form. Most sought either more money than allotted or sought funds that were originally refused entirely.

The Rowing Club, which has not been the recipient of Student Government funds in past years, asked for $680 to buy new oars. Since it is a club sport, rowing receives no funds from the athletic department. The Board stood by the Finance Committee's decision not to fund sports.

The Flying Irish, an organization for pilots and aviation enthusiasts, failed to receive an allocation to get off the ground. The Flying Irish need money for an airplane, which the group says will "pay for itself" within the next two years. The Board decided against it.

Other groups also failed to change the original budget decisions of several other student organizations. These included the Arnold Air Society, the International Students Association, the Glee Club and the International Student Leadership Institute.

Seymour and Welte at the halfway point: Many innovations, more in planning stage

By Mary Janca
Staff Reporter

Welte: Many things accomplished in first six months, like students on the Board of Regents and beginnings of a student center.

Jean Seymour and Sue Welte, recently completed six months of their terms as Student Body Officers at Saint Mary's. In that time they developed and are actively engaged in the passage of three issues of their campaign: 24-hour open lobbies in the halls, extension of male visitation, and the opening of the new Student Center.

Since coming into office, pointed out Sue Welte, Vice President of the Student Body, many innovations have been initiated. Among them, she explained, are student representation on the Board of Regents, the formulation of a Student Center, the proposal of extended male visitation, and the establishment of the Hall Life Commission.

"Student Government is trying to re-orient the students of St. Mary's to this campus, and re-instill pride on the school," stated Julaine Brophy, Community Relations Commissioner.

"The Hall Life Commission," said Mitzi Tracy, Hall Life Commissioner, "is a new committee, created by Jean Seymour and Sue Welte, to open communication between the halls and to know what's going on in the other dorms. It's a way of coordinating things, and getting together with other halls." Composed of Tracy, the four hall presidents, and two representatives from each Hall Council, the Committee has no legislative power or authority, but serves as a line of communication between the halls.

Much of the Student Government, explained Welte, is now involved with the Planning Process.

The question of 24-hour open lobbies has thus far met with unanimous approval, informed Welte, and will be brought up before the Student Affairs Council on Wednesday, Oct. 25.

Regarding the extended male visitation proposal, Tracy said that much more research is required before it can be presented to the Board of Regents in January, because, as she said, "We haven't even begun to scratch the surface."

A survey on parietals is being drawn up, to be distributed in three to four weeks. All SMC students, faculty, administration and a random sampling of parents and alumnae will be questioned as to their views on this subject. This will be done, said Welte, "so all segments may be considered in drawing up proposals." Student Government and the Hall Life Council plan to utilize these surveys to draw up an experimental policy on visitation.

Jean Seymour, Student Body President, is also working for Academic reform. In her campaign, she sought revision of the Pass-Fail rulings, asking that eight courses be taken on a Pass-Fail basis within four years, and that Pass-Fail grades be given in required courses. Seymour also called for an optional, independent study between terms.

Through the Planning Process, ideas for academic change are now being gathered from schools which are about the same size as St. Mary's, stated Natalie Dwyer, a member of the Task Force studying academic revision. Many students are apathetic and uninformed as to the activities of Student Government, while some responded enthusiastically to the work done.

When asked how they viewed the achievements of Seymour and Welte thus far, most Seniors reacted favorably and optimistically.

Juniors and Sophomores, generally, were apathetic and replied that they did not honestly know. Said one typical student, "I don't feel qualified to answer that. All I know is what I read sometimes in The Observer."

One Junior stated "I'm disappointed that they aren't working more closely with Notre Dame," while another suggested that "the Student Body President and Vice President should get more in touch with the student body."

Freshmen, basically, felt that they didn't know enough about Student Government, and had no opinion on the subject.

"We can't accomplish everything overnight. It takes time," stated Welte. She also said, regarding student voice, that "every student here has input directly, either through us or the Planning Process, and one doesn't negate the other in any way."

"In order for the school to function successfully," concluded Welte, "each one of us must feel like a member of a community and demonstrate this through whatever we do."

Saigon -- As President Thieu, Henry A. Kissinger and Ambassador Ellsworth Bunker spent a total of five hours in two separate conferences Thursday, there was a fresh burst of speculation in Saigon that Kissinger and North Vietnamese negotiators might have arrived at some sort of cease-fire agreement that might be unattractive to the Saigon Government. There was no official comment on the talks.

Saigon -- As North Vietnamese forces near Saigon reoccupied at least two hamlets and held on to half a dozen others, an apparent change in tactics has led many South Vietnamese to conclude that the Communists are preparing for a ceasefire. That speculation has arisen because the Communists appear to be carrying out little political activity, while concentrating on holding their positions.

Washington -- A former official of the Central Intelligence Agency said that the Air Force mistakenly bombed a North Vietnamese Leper Colony in 1966 after concluding from aerial photographs that the compound was a North Vietnamese Division Headquarters. The incident was described in a new book by the former agent, who also charged that intelligence specialists were overwhelmingly concerned with providing what he called "intelligence to please."

New York -- A Bronx congressman and a State Supreme Court Justice who preceded him in the House have been questioned by Federal officials in connection with alleged abuses involving private immigration bills. Rep. Mario Biaggi and Justice Paul A. Fino both confirmed that a Manhattan Grand Jury had asked them last year about the heavy volume of bills they sponsored, including bills on behalf of illegal aliens and about payoffs to lawyers and congressmen.

Campus roundup

SMC music board formed

In a continuing effort to more directly involve the faculty and students in policy-making decision, a Music Advisory Committee has been created at Saint Mary's College, Notre Dame.

The committee will consist of four Saint Mary's College music faculty members and two music students.

The faculty members were appointed by Music Department Chairman, Dr. James McCray. The four named are: Michael Hennessey, assistant professor, Arthur Lawrence, assistant professor, Susan Stevens, instructor, Ronald Morebello, instructor.

The student members, one upper level and one lower level, were elected by the music majors of the College. They are Aimee Beckmann, sophomore, of Ankeny, Iowa, and Patricia Bingham, senior, of Seminole, Florida.

Discount ID's offered

The Student Union office announced yesterday that Notre Dame students and faculty are now eligible for special weekend and vacation rates at any Sheraton Hotel or Motor Inn. To be eligible, students must pick up identification cards from the Union office; faculty members should contact Fr. James Shilts, Assistant Vice-President for Student Affairs.

Special rates, subject to room availability at the time of reservation, are in effect from the Wednesday preceding Thanksgiving through the following Sunday, December 15 through January 1, and weekend evenings throughout the year.

The Student Union office will distribute cards each school day from 1 pm to 5 pm.

Musical shows set

Three major musical programs have been scheduled by the Notre Dame's Art Department for guests attending sessions of the Mid-America College Art Association conference on the campus next month.

The Elkhart Symphony Chorus, with John Lund directing, will present the Haydn Mass at 8p.m. November 1 in Sacred Heart Church. Also known as Missa Solemnis in D Minor, the music was written in 1798 and proclaimed the exalted religious spirit of the times.

A group from Northern Illinois University will present a concert of sound and visual elements on the electric stereopticon at 8 p.m. November 2 in Washington Hall.

Original music and visual compositions by Dan Goode, a composer and faculty member at Livingston College of Rutgers University, will be presented at 8 p.m. Friday, November 3. Local musicians and dancers will be trained by Goode for this special performance in the Fieldhouse.

Several hundred delegates are expected to attend the conference, the largest of its kind in the nation. It is the first time it has been held on the Notre Dame campus. An exhibition of the more noteworthy works from the Notre Dame permanent collection of art is in progress now in the O'Shaughnessy Hall Gallery in advance of the conference.

Nixon taking the high schools by ten percent: poll

by John Mathews
(c) 1972 Washington Star-News.

Washington, Oct. 19—A recent poll of some 23,000 high school student leaders across the country shows 47 per cent of the young people favoring President Nixon and 37 per cent support Sen. George S. McGovern—the exact opposite of a similar poll conducted a year ago.

Questions in the poll, conducted this summer, do not clearly define reasons for the dramatic shift in sentiment, although the students appear to be strongly impressed by Nixon's trip to China and the Soviet Union.

But, the students are less enthused with the President's handling of the Vietnam war; only 15 per cent rating it as "excellent," 41 per cent as "satisfactory" and 39 per cent as "unsatisfactory," while 5 per cent were undecided.

The students polled still feel that ending the war and establishing peace are the nation's first priority, followed by protection of the environment and an end to inflation and unemployment. Their view of how to end the war, however, has changed somewhat.

Last year, 44 per cent favored immediate withdrawal of all U.S. troops from Southeast Asia, but this year only 35 per cent take the view. On the other end of favored policies, 11 per cent say they want total military victory, compared to 6 per cent last year. Gradual troop withdrawal is supported by 52 per cent, six percentage points more than last year.

The poll conducted by the publishers of "Who's Who Among American High School Students" in Northfield, Ill., does not purport to be a scientifically weighted national sample. Some 40 per cent of the students polled, for example, are from midwestern states and 42 per cent are suburbanites, both figures unrepresentative of national percentages.

The students polled come from a larger group of 105,000 student leaders selected by their school for the "Who's Who" High School book. Generally, they are among the best students academically, 96 per cent going on to college and 90 per cent having "B" or better averages.

Cleveland, Oct. 19—Some nights it doesn't seem to pay to put on a telethon. Sen. George McGovern has adopted a new campaign tactic of taking his case to voters in the big states by way of telethons. Last night he had hardly settled himself before the cameras when a man called in and demanded: "How soon can I expect my $1,000 check?"

McG's telethons don't seem to be working so well

by Paul Hope
(C) 1972 Washington Star-News

The questions could have come straight out of the White House Political Ready Room.

McGovern had a little trouble with the telephone equipment and at one point he asked the audience to be patient because "We're not as good at electronics as the Republicans are."

The half-hour telethon beamed last night to major Ohio cities and two cities in West Virginia was the second of 10 planned during the final weeks of the campaign. Last week he did one in Minnesota, Monday he'll do one in New York, and others will follow in Wisconsin, California, the state of Washington, Pennsylvania, Illinois, Michigan and in Boston for Northeast states.

They will be followed by the grand-daddy of them all—a nationwide telethon on election eve.

Howard Metzenbaum, a major financial contributor and an active supporter from Ohio, is putting the state-wide telethons together. He said the 10 will cost about $150,000 but he expects to recover the cost and perhaps more through appeals during the broadcasts.

The man who wanted to know when he could get his $1,000 check touched an exposed nerve in the McGovern camp.

"I'd like to be able to give everybody $1,000," McGovern replied. "That was a proposal by some of my economic advisers...but we've moved away from that plan."

The man who accused McGovern of changing his mind on issues also touched home. Public opinion polls indicate that many voters believe McGovern is not consistent.

The man, who identified himself as Todd Harshman of Shaker Heights, said McGovern had changed his mind about amnesty, drugs and tax reform and asked, "How do we know what you really want?"

McGovern said he hadn't changed his mind about any of those things, but Harshman insisted that Sargent Shriver told a Cleveland audience recently that McGovern now was for "partial amnesty" rather than total amnesty.

Then there was the fellow who got into an exchange with the Democratic candidate about how many times he had changed his mind about one thing and another.

And there were... zingers about things like amnesty, abortion, marijuana, pulling out of Vietnam and school busing.

McGovern's advisers professed to be happy about the whole thing because it gave the candidate a chance to answer charges that he is a radical.

They also said it showed he wasn't afraid to come out before the voters while President Nixon hides in the White House.

But to those gathered around the television set in McGovern's press room here, it appeared the candidate was still coming across as being defensive about the issues that have been bothering him throughout the campaign.

And meanwhile the opposition gets heckled

By Duncan Spencer
(C) 1972 Washington Star-News

Green Bay, Wis., Oct. 19 — Vice President Spiro T. Agnew was rounding into the comfortable topics of professional football and the "American competitive spirit" here last night when a hidden voice in the friendly crowd wailed "Murderer."

And in Grand Rapids, Michigan, in his first foray onto a college campus during this campaign, he was heckled furiously and ineffectively by students who shouted, "You're a liar," or simply, "War."

Agnew is still the man who brings out the strong emotions, the one they love to hate in this lukewarm campaign.

But he is well pleased with his hecklers. "I'm delighted with that response," he said while returning to Washington from Green Bay last night. "I'm not going to accommodate a disruption except when it suits my purposes."

There was no disruption of either of the Vice President's precisely planned stops yesterday, only a few voices in the crowd, a few signs which said "Impeach Nixon", "End the War", or "Eat some S-t." But on each occasion Agnew made strong reference to the "discourtesy" or the "lack of civility" of a small proportion of his listeners.

Later in the plane, Agnew made it clear he was not hoping to silence his detractors by chastising them in public. He found them sometimes useful, he said. "You have the power to over-ride them," he mused, "but sometimes it's to your advantage to engage that kind of anti-intellectualism... This is the antithesis of intellectualism, to scream and yell rather than listening to opinions you don't agree with."

Masters and Johnson preview

Human sexuality: myths and truth

Masters and Johnson in Capsule
by Gerald Giantonio

Curiosity about human sexuality seems ingrained in the American way of life; but in spite of this, knowledge in the area has been primarily in the realm of folklore. Probably more than any person (or persons) interested in an objective assessment of the nature of sex, William Masters and Virginia Johnson have made the scientific study of n sexuality an honorable pursuit. Beginning in the 1950's, they instituted a comprehensive study of the human sexual response by bringing their subjects into their laboratories and measuring the physiological and physical correlated of sexual arousal. Their book, Human Sexual Response (1966), which reported over 10 years of research, exploded many myths about human sexuality ranging across such topics as geriatric sea and vaginal versus clitoral orgasm. The impact of this book and the continuing avid interest in Master's and Johnson's later work testifies to our society's desire to better understand human sexuality.

In 1970, Human Sexual Inadequacy was published. This work dealt with the clinical applications of the data collected in their physiological research. While the treatment of sexual inadequacy (e.g., premature ejaculation, frigidity, impotence) has been of therapeutic concern for decades, Master's and Johnson's techniques differed from most others in two basic respects: the short duration, intensive therapy (2 weekd) snf relatively high degrees of success for most inadequacies.

SEX AND MYTH
by Rev. Thomas McNally, C.S.C.

"People are surprised that we don't have two heads."

Mrs. Virginia Johnson, the feminine half of the sex research team of Masters and Johnson, made the comment wistfully once as she surveyed an audience roughly similar to the one which probably will gather next Monday night at Washington Hall.

And it's true that she and Dr. William Masters have picked up their share of scars, as well as medals, in the sexual areana. As probably everybody knows by now they have piloted a sex research project in St. Louis which has produced a staggering amount of physiological data and a fair-to-staggering amount of controversy about their results and methods. They get more than their share of pornographic hate mail - sadly misaddressed because both are compassionate persons who are said to be less concerned about the mechanics of sex than about the human tragedies which result from distorted ideas about sex.

However, their approach to the subject cannot possibly touch all the sexual bases. (The talk Monday night is entitled "Facts and Fallacies about Human Sexual Response.") In two articles I would like to suggest a Christian orientation to the subject of sexuality by reviewing a recent book by Eugene Kennedy. ((The New Sexuality. Myths, Fables, and Hang-ups. Doubleday & Company, Inc. 1972 Available in the bookstore.) Kennedy, a priest-psychologist, is well respected in his field and frankly favorable to Masters and Johnson, whom he mentions several times in his book.

Kennedy spends most of his time and pages writing about myths which men use to keep their world in focus and avoid raising too many disturbing questions. The myths in question concern sexuality and Kennedy explodes them in a series of chapters which I will highlight in this segment and the second article in the series.

THE MYTH THAT SEX WAS JUST DISCOVERED: The secret of sex, he says, has been out a long time. "Our civilization would be better off if we could rid ourselves of the minor conceit which claims that finally we know everything we have ever wanted to know about sex, when actually we are still working at it."

Is there a revolution taking place in sexual behavior? Kennedy quotes research which casts a doubt on any such theory. These researchers were unable to establish, for example, the existence of four criteria which they considered necessary for the existence

Dr. Kissinger meets Thieu

Saigon, Oct. 19--South Vietnamese President Nguyen Van Thieu twice held secret talks with Dr. Henry A. Kissinger today, and the South Vietnamese government publicly reasserted its determination not to be pressured into an arranged coalition with the communists.

A basic element of communist peace plans has been the establishment of a coalition government that would give them a share of power in Saigon. The coalition then would arrange elections.

But a government announcement, issued at the time for the initial 3-1/2 hours of talks between 15 top South Vietnamese and American officials, insisted that the South Vietnamese people would have to be asked to agree to the establishment of any coalition "through democratic mean," apparently meaning elections under thieu's control

The implication of the announcement was that Thieu would not allow the United State to talk him into any peace-plan arrangement which he feared might open the door to a communist take-over.

After the lengthy morning session with Thieu, Kissinger had lunch with U.S. Ambassador Ellsworth Bunker; then the two returned in the afternoon for another meeting with Thieu.

There was no word, either official or unofficial, on what was said.

The Thieu-Kissinger talks were officially described in advance as dealing with the current situation and the Developments in the Paris peace talks with Hanoi.

Wills explains the 'sellout'

by Cavid Rust
Staff Reporter

Gary Wills explained to a crowd of about 125 last night in the library auditorium how a president's "sell-out" after election was not actually a sell-out but "compensatory redoubling."

Met by frequent bursts of laughter at his train of paradox after shrewd insight, Wills, scholar, professor and author of several books including 1970's Nixon Agonistes, expressed his disbelief in the honesty or worth of either Richard Nixon or George McGovern and explained his four points to understanding the American political process in a lecture entitled "The Loss of the American Tradition."

But why not?

Wills: "Why should politicians be so bad? The better question is, why shouldn't they?"

Brought to Notre Dame by the Academic Commission, Wills' most recent accomplishments have included the publication of his book Bare Ruined Choirs, an article "Chic Imprisonment," about his arrest at the "Celebrity Demonstration" of earlier this year in the current issue of Playboy magazine, and his earlier lecture on witches and Shakespeare delivered earlier in the day at Notre Dame (see story below). He touched on none of these during his two-hour lecture.

"Why should politicians be so bad?" asked Wills. "The better question is, why shouldn't they?"

The reason, he divined, was contained in his "four inhibitions" acting on men who live the political life: "the out-middling strategy, governability after election, compensatory redoubling (the sell-out) and the continuity factor."

Each politician begins with his assured constituency, analysed lecturer Wills, and spends his campaign trying for the "middle people." "The way to do this," he said, "is to try to figure out what all those middle people want, and then to rush out and deliver it to them."

The result, he concluded, is that at the end of the election, "you can't tell one's statements from the other without their being labeled." He presented evidence: McGovern's law-and-order pledges in Brooklyn, Mison's welfare reform and peace wishes.

"Actual campaigning becomes a kind of dance with partners nodding to each other and breaking in" in their vying for the middle people's alliance, said Wills.

In their struggle to get the votes of middle grounders, issues come and go with surprising facility.

The Vietnam War, against which Wills expressed strong opposition, has been used with that kind of facility.

"In 1964 President Johnson pretended the war wasn't there," said Wills, "whereas Goldwater got clobbered" because he "told the truth about it." In 1968 "no one would talk" about their plans for it too seriously because they were all afraid of "disturbing the peace plans" supposedly circulating between Washington and Hanoi. And in 1970, said Wills, "Nixon killed the war issue."

There is remarkable "blandness" during election time, remarked Wills, in the midst of the "muddling of issues" and the "putting off of decisions" that take the wace of the "national debate and clarification of the issues" that Americans believe an election is all about.

What assures a candidate's governability after election? Wills contended that it is basically two things: the fact that in the United States "men stand by an election and abide by it," and that people "won't let him rule the way he wants."

The out-middling, evil as it might seem, is advantageous in Wills' view in that it is the thing that gives the candidate-become-president his "acceptability and creditability" needed to have good governability. The two reinforce each other, as Wills explains it.

Then there is the sell out, or compensatory redoubling. "God knows what Nixon will do in a second term," quoted Wills of Nixon's original constituency, after Nixon's "sell-out" to the communists in Peking and Moscow, and to the causes of a

Witch trials common

Wills reviews Shakespeare

by Ann-Therese Darin
Campus Editor

Trials for witches were more common than trials for homicides in Shakespearean England, claimed Gary Wills, nationally syndicated columnist and lecturer yesterday at Notre Dame.

Although the thirty-two year old journalist is noted for his political commentary, especially his best-selling Nixon Agonistes, he is a trained classicist with graduate degrees from Xavier and Yale Universities.

Speaking to a library auditorium audience of twenty-five students, Wills previewed material on witchcraft in Shakespeare's plays for a book which he plans to publish soon. He illustrated the sixty-minute lecture and question period with several slides of woodcuts depicting witches dating from the early 1600s. He also based a considerable amount of his afternoon lecture on a seventeenth century chronicle of witchcraft titled, "News from Scotland."

In slow, measured words, the classicist explained the popular practice of witchcraft during the Bard's era. Any old women, usually hags, with moles, or other eccentricities, could be suspected of black magic. "Kings used to kill a lot of witches," Wills recounted, "to prove that they were God's anointed."

Enumerating many characteristics of witches (love of candles, brews, warts, moles, animals addressed in affectionate terms, broomsticks, and a tendency toward illiteracy and old age), Wills cited their use in Shakespearean drama. He named as representative witches in the Bard's plays Macbeth, Lady Macbeth, Richard III, Cleopatra, Puck, and Othello.

While witchcraft was not limited to women, Wills deduced that female witches were more common than male witches in the seventeenth century. King James in his "Demonology" remarked that witches were commonly women because women are the weaker sex, Wills related. The journalist added that King James felt that the evil spirits could more easily control women than men.

Wills also emphasized the significance of the candle as a sign of witchcraft. "The candle," he asserted, "was her most clear mark." According to the classicist, a witch was considered the devil's acolyte. Since the acolyte at a white mass was a man, the acolyte at a black mass would

Semester enrollment up from last year

Final enrollment figures for the 1972 fall semester at the Notre Dame and six overseas programs indicate a total of 8,557 students, an increase over last year's record 8,237. The figure includes 6,772 in undergraduate colleges and the Freshman Year of Studies program, and 1,825 in Law School and other graduate programs.

Increases were noted in all the undergraduate colleges with the largest enrollment spurt reported by the College of Business Administration, 1,161 compared to last year's 976. Arts and Letters enrollment is 2,267, up from last year's 2,255, Science gained 100 to stand at 923, and Engineering is 757, an increase of seven. Only Freshman Year showed a light decrease, 1,614 compared to last year's 1,635.

Law School enrollment dropped from 499 to 468, graduate programs increased from 1,142 to 1,202, and the master's program in Business Administration went from 157 to 165. The Law School enrollment includes 59 women compared to last year's 37, and 20 student in the second year program conducted in London. There are 14 part-time students of law this year, compared to four last year.

Enrolled on the overseas campuses this year are 224 Notre Dame students, and increase of 52 over the 1971 figure of 172. These include 59 at Innsbruck; 47 at Angers, 17 in Mexico City, 18 in Sophia, Japan, and 57 in Rome.

The Budget is passed

The Board of Commissioners passed the student government budget yesterday. The only major revisions to the finance committee's recommendations that the board made were separate financing of the New Frontier Scholastic Society and a restructuring of the financial arrangements of the hall life fund and the hall grant program.

Club changes

The decision to fund the New Frontier Scholastic Society as a separate club was a wise one. It was unfair to lump the two groups together just because of the race of their members. Now the Society of Ujamma is established as the replacement for the defunct Afro-American Society.

Whether it was a good idea to designate one group as the sole replacement for the old organization is probably a question that can be debated at great length for the next couple of years (among those who are interested), but the issue had to be settled somehow. There was no point in student government diving into the internal structures of the two organizations.

Now the Society of Ujamma and the New Frontier Scholastic Society can operate on separate budgets for the different activities that they are planning. Under the new accounting system in the treasurer's office, these two clubs and all the others will have to prove that they are spending the money as per their budget requests.

Hall funds

In the area of hall funds, it is unfortunate that a basically sound plan had to be modified because the Hall Presidents Council insisted on making itself an unnecessary middleman in the process. The HPC exists only as an outgrowth of the individual hall governments. The demand that money budgeted for the halls be channeled through the HPC was merely the addition of an extra hurdle between the funds and the students in the residence halls.

Now the HPC gets $2000 to run An Tostal and $5100 will go directly to the halls from student government. (The $400 difference between the present allocation and the original one is the money that was given to the New Frontier Scholastic Society.) The idea of a rebate that was inherent in the original proposal has a lot of merit, but its obvious that $14 only goes so far. You can't have it both ways—either the clubs suffer or (to some extent) the halls suffer. Under the circumstances, a solid balance was established.

John Abowd

Remember the good ol' days back in high school when a sudden ringing of class bells in the middle of class was a time of great rejoicing? Why? Because it meant that today's religion lesson or Henry VIII chapter would be postponed in favor of a little walk around the school. In other words, the Fire Department was running one of their little goodies again, and everybody gets a break.

Remember how they went? Three bells meant "everybody out as fast as possible (but always quietly and dignified)." Two bells meant "everybody back in and hit the books again." One bell meant "freeze where you are," a command that caused human statues in grade school. This last wasn't that common, but sure made for a lot of stares from passing drivers.

Well, friends, it seems that St. Mary's doesn't want its students to forget the good ol' days, for they've kept the fine old tradition of fire drills alive all these years. A few things are different from secondary school times, but for the most part, the fun is still there.

2:30's a good time

Some of the differences show up more quickly than others. For instance, why waste the time of a class to have a fire drill. After all, any real fire wouldn't have the audacity to do something like that. Therefore, it's better to switch the time to the evening hours, like say, 2:30 a.m. That way it'll also impress upon the students the meaning of the drill.

Secondly, why use expensive bells to tell the students when to evacuate? Loud buzzers are much more effective—that'll wake up even the most fatigued student and get her marching.

Thirdly, and here comes the cleverest part, a way to keep the students awake during the proceedings is needed, for after all, when a student stays up to 1:00 to study for her 8:00 midterm, she might be a bit less responsive than is desired. St. Mary's solution: run the girls out, in nightgowns and robes only (sometimes no shoes, into the frigid Indiana air and more than occasional South Bend snow. And from what I hear, it works damn well—St. Mary's security have yet to find a girl asleep in the bushes the day after a drill.

Bonds of friendship

SMC fire drills also play a part in other areas of the college experience. For instance, the bonds of friendship among students are strengthened immeasurably the next day—just look at all the long line of students carrying sick trays back to the dorms from the dining hall. Listen to all the requests to borrow class notes. Hear the sweet harmonies, ones that must require a good deal of practice, of coughing and sneezing.

And in the social department. What better way for a St. Mary's student to show her real self to her Notre Dame boyfriend (or any male wandering around the SMC campus at the time—it doesn't really matter the boyfriend'll get the story eventually) than as a blue shivering mass of nightgown and less in curlers? Sometimes the girls will even get a free show right there as three wandering minstrel-types provided at a Regina drill last year.

Keep an eye on Suzy

And something important from the parents' end: what better way to check up on little Suzy's activities? Who knows what lustful, passionate things she's doing with that Notre Dame brute? But if she's in bed when drill time comes, we'll know she's safe. We don't know about having guarded open lobbies, but we'll fight to the death to keep our daughters safe and cold!

Before I came to the Dome, I went to a public high school. Since I've been here, I've found out that most students around here went to parochial or private high schools. We had another kind of drill in public high school, an air raid drill. I thought they were kidding the first time but I later concluded that it was logical, since it was intended for a nuclear attack. Depending on the age of the building, a loud gong or a creaking buzzer would sound three times, at which signal everybody would file into the corridors and get down on hands and knees and cover the back of the neck with his hands. We did all this up against the corridor walls while the teachers walked up and down, making sure we didn't talk. My teachers' "bravery" in exposing themselves if the thing had been real never did impress me, and I figured that about half the bones in my body would have been shattered if any concussion had been involved in the attack. In other words, typical institutional stupidity.

St. Mary's seems to have been able to keep up the tradition of fire drills quite well. Here's a new tradition after all, Notre Dame starts at least one a year for them: inaugurating an air-raid drill every other night. That way, loyal St. Mary's students won't be caught unaware when the world destroys itself.

I'll be curious to see what modifications they'll make in the procedure.

shoplifting: to take or not to take

(c) 1972 New York Times News Service

New York—The group of high school students in Connecticut's affluent Fairfield County were part of an encounter session and when the subject got around to shoplifting they had no trouble comparing experiences, recounting exploits.

"What have you stolen?" one girl was asked. Laughing, she struggled to recall the harvest of several years: "Shirts, eyeliner, eyeshadow, nail polish, cartons of cigarettes, earrings, bracelets, rings, candy, wallets, belts, underwear, purses, tapes (about $200 worth), combs, necklaces, scarves..."

Shoplifting, like every other crime, has moved into the suburbs; across the nation it has increased in the last decade by about 174 per cent. The loss (which includes employee-theft as well as customer-theft) amounted to $3.5 billion last year, according to the National Retail Merchants Association. The cost, of course, is passed on to the customer.

Who are the shoplifters? Besides the professionals and the drug addicts and the occasional kleptomaniac, there is the vast army of amateurs who steal for personal reason.

Big stores, particularly in the city, have long recognized the problem, but suburban retailers with small shops are just beginning to acknowledge it, and the suburbs provide a happy hunting ground for amateur and professional alike.

"It's a very difficult problem," said Andre Schanzer, owner of Livingston Stationers in Englewood, N. J. "I have spent 30 to 40 per cent of my time being a policeman rather than a merchant."

Security experts estimate that more than 50 per cent of the shoplifters are juveniles, with women in their thirties and forties providing another substantial group. "We are suspicious every time we see a woman push a baby carriage through the store," said a retailer in the Manuet Mall, Nanuet, N. Y.

In many suburban towns, shoplifting seems to reach epidemic proportions among early teen-agers—at the junior high school level.

Mrs. Joy Walker, a Fairfield County high school teacher who conducts communications workshops and human relations classes, sees shoplifting as a way that teen-agers test themselves and prove their resourcefulness and courage.

"Though they place honesty high on their list of values, they see no connection between shoplifting and dishonesty," she said. "In junior high school shoplifting is a status thing," explained one high school student. "You are out to prove you are groovy and you can make it. You brag about it on the school bus."

"It's like a game," said another. "You watch television, like 'to catch a thief,' and you watch him climb down the roof and you say, 'that's really heavy!'"

"The people who work in the store are going to feel like jerks when they realize you got away with it."

What happens if parents find out? "To be caught by your parents is almost as challenging as stealing," said one girl. "You can come up with great explanations. Convincing your parents where you got it is part of the game."

Judge Margaret Driscoll of the juvenile court in Fairfield County said parents' reactions vary when their children are caught shoplifting.

"Some parents think it's much ado about nothing and some parents are shocked," she said. "They can't imagine their child doing it."

Teen-agers point out defensively that "adults do it all the time, only in more subtle ways," that mother take groceries from the supermarket ("but they don't consider it stealing, just taking") and that fathers cheat on income taxes.

Suburban retailers deal with shoplifting in various ways, from extreme reluctance to open admission of its existence, from simple watchfulness to highly sophisticated means of coping.

Control of shoplifting seems to depend upon security devices combined with trained personnel and eternal vigilance. More and more shopkeepers are seeking professional help, and security companies are booming.

Shoplifting seems to flourish in many regional shopping centers. Security authorities say the impersonal climate may be one major reason—most of the stores are owned by large chains, management is frequently replaced and few salespeople get to know their customers.

irene backalenick

Aron Breslow, who co-owns Breslow Brothers, a stationery and book store in New Canaan, Conn., comments: "In a small town like this you know most of the kids and you feel you are close to them. You give them a certain trust, and when they don't honor it, financially and personally, it's a double hurt."

The willingness of store owners to talk about shoplifting varies from community to community. Shopkeepers in New Canaan, for example, are in general extremely reluctant to talk about it ("Of course we have some; doesn't everybody?" one insisted).

But in Westport, Conn., it has become such a problem that the reticence has disappeared. In the last year, many Westport shops have installed security devices and are no longer reluctant to call the police, even for young offenders.

The usual penalty for first offenders in Connecticut is a $20 fine.

Authorities offer two reasons why shoplifting appears to have become such a national pastime. They say today's values permit it and merchandising, with its emphasis on eye appeal and availability of good, encourages it.

The browser is urged to see, touch, take. Self-service stores have few salespeople on the floor. What it comes down to, authorities say, is that today's society encourages the urge in everyone to beat the system.

cologne: excellent

joseph abell

What can you say about a world-famous orchestra like the Cologne? Nearly everybody agrees that it's one of the best around in its field, and after last night's concert, I must admit that I wholeheartedly agree.

So what can I say? How about if I tell you about the members of the orchestra. For the most part, they were young, something that really surprised me. After seeing the Vienna Symphony Orchestra last year, I was expecting white ties and full tails, not black pants and turtlenecks. Nearly every member of the orchestra looked under 30, complete with continental hairstyles (which seems logical).

Okay, so they were longhairs in more than one sense. That doesn't say much about the music, which is the basic reason people went, right? The music, if not familiar, was by familiar composers of the Baroque period: three different Bachs and Mozart. And the playing was nothing short of virtuoso.

The concert began with Johann Christoph Friedrich Bach's Sinfonie in D minor, done with eight violins, two violas, two cellos, one bass, and a harpsichord. It was a light, intriguingly intricate piece in which the quick staccato notes of the violins dominated musically as much as the harpsichord dominated the stage. The sinfonie was of the usual fast-slow-fast three movement pattern, and the performance, especially the second movement, conveyed the musicians' sincerity. The only fault I could find was that the strings completely overpowered the harpsichord. I don't know why, but I couldn't hear the harpsichord at all during this piece, and that tended to weaken the Baroque flavor of the piece.

The second work featured solo pianist Justus Frantz, a small, dapper man who, once his glasses are in place, looks like his mind is on business alone. He's the only one in a full tuxedo and looks a bit awkward onstage with the more casually-dressed orchestra members. The composer this time is Mozart, his Concerto in A major KV414 for Piano and Orchestra, and though originally meant for a full orchestra, the Cologne Chamber has adapted the material admirably for its purposes. The piece starts out lyrically and with the second motive, a march rhythm emerges. Here the pianist takes over for a number of interactions with the orchestra dotted with an occasional piano cadenza. The piano follows the string motive at first, but later declares its independence as soloist Frantz' virtuosity becomes more apparent. His quick high notes become so fluid at one point as to simulate flute notes.

The second movement is a bit more solemn in tone, keeping with the fast-slow-fast pattern, and there is much more emphasis on the soloist. In the third, Frantz shines as he leads the orchestra through a number of complex passages.

At this point was supposed to be an intermission, but pianist Frantz continued top play, encouraged by enthusiastic applause. Something more contemporary, Prokofiev's Finale from the Seventh Sonata proved beyond a doubt Frantz' ability. This highly complex piece was played almost viciously by the soloist, who afterwards returned three times for well-deserved curtain calls.

The second part of the concert flowed a bit more easily, mostly due to the addition of an oboe soloist. The harpsichord was put aside for C. P. E. Bach's Concerto in E flat major for Oboe and String Orchestra, and a more whimsical tone was added to the strings courtesy of soloist Gunther Passin.

Written in 1765, the piece again follows the fast-slow-fast pattern, one that results in a first movement that takes off in a flight of fantasy, a more reflective, sombre second movement, and a lively, vigorous third movement. In the third movement especially, the oboe blended most effectively with the strings, sometimes losing its identity among them.

The last scheduled piece, a Mozart divertimento, was discarded in favor of a Mozart concerto for oboe, strings, and harpsichord. This was the most effective of the orchestra pieces, as oboe, strings and even harpsichord played a significant part in creation of the work. Easily one of the peaks of the concert, it encouraged the audience to call conductor Helmut Muller-Bruhl back for three curtain calls.

A quick encore followed, the Air from the Third Orchestral Suite by Johann Sebastian Bach, a string-dominated piece with harpsichord. Not as exciting as the preceding works, it was, however, a fitting finale to a satisfying concert.

St. Mary's has recently taken a second place to no one when it comes to music. First Ravi Shankar and now the Cologne Chamber Orchestra. What next? Whatever, I hope it is up to the caliber of these two excellent presentations.

Theatre Notes flying high

I. franklin devine

At one point in Walter Kerr's adaptation of Aristophanes' The Birds, the bird chorus warns any reviewers in the audience that if they don't like the play, "When you walk down the street you had better wear a hat." This is one man who's crossing the campus bareheaded.

The National Players' Tuesday night visit of O'Laughlin was an evening of wonderfully zany theater. It's not often any more that audiences see wild, broad slapstick comedy executed as well as by this traveling company from Washington's Catholic University. Director Edward Cashman's superb blocking and stage business was easily the highlight of the show.

Comedy schticks straight from vaudeville and old Marx Brothers films lent a whole new perspective to the classic Greek comedy. Kerr's adaptation of Aristophanes lends itself to Cashman's broad low comedy style.

The wild, burlesque-y, vaudeville-ish comedy does proper justice to the fifth century B.C. author, no less an authority than Aristotle looked down upon Aristophanes' work as rough and vulgar. In a time when the plotless comedies of Groucho, Harpo, Chico, and Zeppo are in vogue, when the Three Stooges bring a crowd to the TV, when the antics of Woody Allen reign supreme in the film world, it's brilliant of the National Players to bring the work of the grandfather of them all on national tour.

Much as Allen or the Marxes abandoned standard conventions of their medium for the sake of a quick gag, Aristophanes abandoned the conventions of the classic theater forms freely, wildly, delightfully. Director Cashman takes every opportunity that Aristophanes and Kerr offer to allow his actors to break in and out of character and situation. It works! It works perfectly!

The National Players worked smoothly as an ensemble. Despite the excellent individual performances by Kevin Gilmartin and Richard Winterstein as the two unhappy men who try to set up a paradise among the birds, it's the ensemble which dominates the show. The interaction and movement of the ensemble, choreographed by Donna Welby was often breathtaking. Welby appeared in the ensemble as one of the birds of Cloud Cuckooland.

Movement was the key to this production of The Birds. The clumsy movement of the men of the show constantly contrasting with the smoothness of the birds, particularly the King Bird played by John Gray.

The importance of movement was reflected in Joseph Lewis' colorful, flapping costumes which were at once both outrageous and graceful. When seeing the design of someone such as Lewis, one is reminded of just how much imaginative designers can add to a production.

Rolf Seyer's simple set and lighting never got in the way of the performance. The rocks and clouds of Cloud Cuckooland reflected the contempt of Aristophanes for theater convention...becoming a parody of theater sets. The parody was continued in the music for the performance, much of it by Spike Jones.

It's frustrating to a reviewer to write of a one night performance. One can only gloat about catching one of the best ensembles to appear on the NC-SMC scene in a long time. Well, maybe you can catch the National Players on tour here next year.

There's additional theater activity on the campus this week. Danny Chambis, an ND sophomore, opens his production of an original experimental dance program, Visionary Revelations of Man. The program is the first production of the season for the ND-SMC Lab Theatre. It opens Friday night at 8:00 at the Little Theatre on the St. Mary's campus. The performances, both Friday and Saturday nights are free.

Meanwhile, as the Lab Theatre opens, Director Charles Ballinger's major production of The Lion in Winter is preparing to travel. The ND-SMC Theatre production is scheduled for a Michigan City production next week.

To speak at design congress

McCandless : Mexico City a start

by Patti Shea
Staff Reporter

Notre Dame architecture student Ken McCandless, hopes to draw international attention to the environmental benefits of geotecture at a hemisphere congress on design in Mexico City next week.

McCandless, who considers himself a blend of artist and designer, was invited to speak at the "Design in the Americas" Congress after submitting an abstract of work he has done in geotecture while studying environmental design at Notre Dame.

"Geotecture, which is the design of underground structure, should be a global concern," McCandless declared. "It would provide an excellent way of fostering international cooperation."

McCandless pointed to the fact that geotecture depends on the geological conditions of the land. "As these natural conditions do not stop at national boundaries, geotecture is truly an international concern."

He pointed out that the geological environment of the Rocky Mountains extended from Canada to Mexico.

Mexico City, the location of the congress, was termed by McCandless as the "perfect place" to present his ideas. He cited the recent completion of the world's most modern subway system there as evidence of what man could do with underground architectural design.

"Surface saturation" was termed by McCandless to be one of the main reasons why he feels geotecture is a practical design. "Why couldn't we build movie theaters, warehouses, and factories underground?" he questioned. Such designs would eliminate crowded areas in cities and also reduce maintenance cost in the long run according to McCandless.

Advantages of easier control of temperature, humidity, and noise in geotectural buildings were also mentioned by McCandless.

In addition to the practical value of geotecture, McCandless emphasized the importance of beauty in this type design. "Living art," McCandless explained, "is achieved through the harmony of nature and man-made structures." McCandless maintained that geotecture, because it is designed on an environmental level, would provide beauty.

Saying that architecture should become more radical, McCandless indicated that geotecture would cause far-reaching changes in the areas such as zoning laws in many countries.

Looking ahead to the design congress where he will present his views McCandless commented, "This congress will be to environmental design what the Stockholm congress was to the political world."

New grants received for research, facilities

Notre Dame accepted $268,608 for the month of September to support individual faculty projects in research, as well as educational programs and new facilities and equipment, according to Dr. Robert E. Gordon, vice president for advanced studies.

Awards for research totaled $248,016 and included:

--$77,120 from the National Institutes of Health (NIH) for a study of "Behavior of Errors in Discretized Physical Models" by Dr. Sidney Kelsey, professor of civil engineering.

--$27,398 from the NIH for research on "Language Attitudes of Bilingual Chicanos" by Dr. Ellen Bouchard Ryan, assistant professor of psychology.

--$20,273 from the NIH for research on "Amino Acids and Protein Metal Complexes" by Rev. Joseph Walter, C.S.C., associate professor of chemistry.

--$16,655 from the NIH for research on Isozymes of Glutamate Aspartate Transaminase" by Dr. Marino Martinez-Carrion, associate professor of chemistry.

--$14,070 from the National Academy of Sciences for a "Nuclear Data Compilation Program" directed by Dr. Cornelius P. Browne, professor of physics.

--$9,000 from the United Cancer Council as a grant-in-aid to the Lobund Laboratory.

--$6,000 from the Indiana Education Service Foundation for a study of "Mobile Home Indoor Air Purification Systems" by Dr. Andrew R. McFarland, associate professor of civil engineering.

--$5,000 from Miles Laboratories, Inc. as a grant-in-aid to the Department of Chemistry.

--$5,000 from Miles Laboratories, Inc. as a grant-in-aid to the Department of Microbiology.

--$3,900 from the U.S. Steel Foundation as a graduate-study fellowship in the Office of Advanced Studies.

--$3,000 from Telecommunication Industries, Inc. for evaluation of "Wastewater Treatment Apparatus" directed by the College of Engineering.

--$500 from the Carroll City Cancer Association as a grant-in-aid to the Department of Microbiology.

--$500 from Ben C.P. Han as a grant-in-aid to the Department of Aerospace and Mechanical Engineering.

--$300 from Schott Industries, Inc. as a grant-in-aid to the Department of Civil Engineering. Awards for educational programs totaled $15,092 and included:

--$11,592 from the Indiana Criminal Justice Planning Agency of St. Joseph County for an internship program directed by Leslie G. Foschio, assistant dean of the Law School.

--$2,500 from the L. Sudler Foundation for the Musical Arts for "Instruction for Secondary Wood Wind Instruments" by James S. Phillips, assistant professor of music.

--$1,000 from the Sun Oil Company as a grant-in-aid to the Department of Chemical Engineering.

SMC schedules films on Indian culture

Three short movies on classical Indian dance, music, and folk festivals will be shown on Sunday, October 22, 1972 at 7:30 p.m. in Carroll Hall, Madeleva Memorial, Saint Mary's College, Notre Dame.

A half-hour color film will stage the famous Kathakali, a costumed dance drama, accompanied by classical music, from the southern state of Kerala. Two short films will highlight the performance of the celebrated drummers of Manipur and the exciting folk music, including the traditional boat racing songs of the south.

The entire event will be fifty minutes long. This film series is sponsored by the College's History department. The public is invited, free of charge.

Many seniors placed through GRAD program

Over half of the seniors who participated in the Placement Bureau's GRAD II program were matched with potential employers.

The print-outs from the service are available at room 222 in the administration building this afternoon beginning at 1:00.

GRAD II is a computerized service designed to match graduating college students with employers who are looking for new employees with particular majors, or career interests.

Three hundred fifty-nine seniors participated in the initial GRAD II RUN. Another session will start soon and end on Dec. 1, according to Richard Willemin, placement bureau director.

Notre Dame students averaged 4.4 matches per student, Willemin added. Participants were allowed to list up to three career interests which the computer matched with available employers.

Wills discusses witchcraft

naturally be a woman, he said. "Witchcraft was very rarely a funny matter," he concluded. If a jury could prove that a witch inflicted death, death would be inflicted on the witch in return. For lesser crimes, a witch would be sentenced to wear a white gown and carry a candle in public for a certain number of days as penance, Wills reported.

Before Wills publishes his treatise on witches and Shakespeare, he plans to write another book on politics, "A follow-up to Nixon Agonistes if I only knew what that was," he stated. One of the few successful freelance writers in America today, he left a teaching position at Johns Hopkins University in 1967 to act as a contributing editor for Esquire Magazine.

"I was greedy," he confided. "Esquire asked me to be a contributing editor—four articles a year and then three. They paid a good deal more than Johns Hopkins." In 1970, he left Esquire to devote all his time to his syndicated columns and manuscripts.

Interviewed after the afternoon speech ended, Wills predicted that Nixon would win the presidency by a large percentage of votes in November. Comparing Nixon to Warren Harding, he said, "the American people are getting exactly what they deserve."

ve...unimaginative, scared, constrictive..."

Questioned on the premise of a recent Scholastic article speculating that Shakespeare's plays were really written by Sir Francis Bacon, Wills replied, "Bacon didn't have the time to write Shakespeare's plays. He was too busy as an aspiring politician."

He also briefly talked about his new book, Bare-Ruined Choirs. "The title comes from Sonnet 73," explained the English scholar. According to Wills, the book links the recent developments in the Catholic Church to recent developments in American politics. "In the Kennedy years, Catholics were enthusiastic; in the Johnson years, they were disillusioned; in the Nixon years they just don't care," he summarized.

"Today we are living in a Middle-Americanized Catholic Church," he commented. The book is reviewed in this week's Time, Newsweek, and this month's issue of Playboy Magazine. November's Playboy also features an article authored by Wills on "Imprisonment Chic," chronicling the jailing of beautiful people who protest social problems.

Refusing to prophesize the future of the Catholic Church in America, Wills said, "If you could, the act of prophecy would be evil."

Not trained as a professional journalist, Wills felt that graduate training in journalism would have hampered him. "You have to have something to write about before you can write," he said. Graduate school, in general, ruins writers...would you send a Mailer to graduate school? There have been hardly any good journalists, novelists or poets who have gone to graduate school. It is much better to just start writing and experiencing."

No laughing matter

Wills: Witchcraft was no laughing matter to Shakespeare's contemporaries. If convicted, death by hanging, not the traditionally thought burning at the stake, was possible.

Erratum

Several inaccurate statements were attributed to Dr. Robert Gordon, Vice President for Advanced Studies, in yesterday's article: "TA salaries de-emphasized."

"The caption under my picture implies that I stated that TA salaries should be uniform with a $2400 minimum. I did not. Nor did I charge both faculty and students with 'no real commitment to scholarship.' A graduate student present made the observation that many students pursued only formal requirements for a degree and did not appear to be immersed in their discipline to the extent that they would fully participate in discussions, formal or informal, of their work. I asked for clarification, 'Are you saying that they do not have a real commitment to scholarship?,' " Gordon said.

controlled economy and big government spending.

"That's not really a sell-out," contended Wills, labeling it a mere consequence of the out-middling strategy. After all, the middlers elect the President too, he said. In understanding our system it's easy to see that a candidate, once installed in office, is "bound to please his own constituency less than any other."

Each president's former out-middling leaves a vast "maneuverable space facing out toward the people," said Wills, and each is tempted to move into it, a temptation which is often the reflection of his own move into it, a temptation which is often the reflection of his own beliefs which have been distorted in their translation to the public.

Thus, Franklin Roosevelt promised less government spending in 1932, and "all history knows what kind of fiscal belt-tightening FDR pulled off." Woodrow Wilson and Lyndon Johnson promised peace and delivered wars. Richard Nixon swears by anti-communism and, as the pundits say, "clinks glasses with communists in Peking and Moscow."

But this is not totally disadvantageous, Wills hurriedly countered. It also makes possible the most enlightened and far-reaching civil rights legislation in U.S. history, pushed through Congress by LBJ, a Southerner—but "a Southerner is the only one who could have pulled it off." John Kennedy, he said, "is the only one who could have (failed to) go soft on Catholics" in the area of Catholic aid with federal government monies. And only Nixon could go to be friends with the Red Chinese and Russians.

Labels of conservative and liberal, anti-communist and peacenik are mainly "tactical" anyway, said Wills, the meaning of which are lost in the out-middling. Then there is the continuity principle, given life by the fact that the American elective system makes each election a "legitimation" of the government. If there is one thing an election is not, said Wills, that thing is an "instrument of change."

"We all have a great love of (an election's) settling aspects," said Wills. "At a time when other governments are considered unstable," the U.S. is at its most "even" at election. The tradition is again being enacted and the nation is comforted.

The change comes, believes Wills, when the society decries it, the result of a movement begun by a group of "people with principles, who couldn't be elected mayor of South Bend (e.g. the 'weirdoes' who conducted the Vietnam teach-ins of the mid-60's). This inspires the President to act upon it and consequent laws and re-election to legitimize it.

"Roosevelt sold out," said Wills, "and then got retrospective validation of his programs. The things that start the momentum of change are unpredictable," making a strong case, believes Wills, for the existence of human freedom.

Wills turned his attention to McGovern several times during his lecture, labeling his nomination a "political freak," and him "the beneficiary of an extraordinary (amassment) of accidents." He noted that McGovern carried with him to the convention only 28 per cent of the total primary vote, and was nominated by a party body which was 20 per cent college graduated while the country's populace is only 6 per cent, and a block representation which was 40 per cent college graduated and with an average income that made them the "aristocracy of America," thus rendering the convention delegate picking process "an oddly skewed system."

But Wills could not emphasize enough, either in his hour lecture or in the 45-minute question-and answer period that followed, that he was not being "cynical," but rather "hopeful." Besides generally seeming to trust the American political system, even if for all the ostensibly wrong reasons, he found reason to be optimistic in the disillusionment America is beginning to experience with itself.

"America was put together by a lot of rationalist types," said Wills, "who reasoned that anybody could put together a country in five days." The product of their work carried with it advantages and limitations, he said, the latter of which we are just beginning to realize. He sees the realization as "healthy."

He did not confine the giving of the back of his hand to McGovern only, since the common denominator in his contempt for both Nixon and McGovern was the fact of their profession: politics.

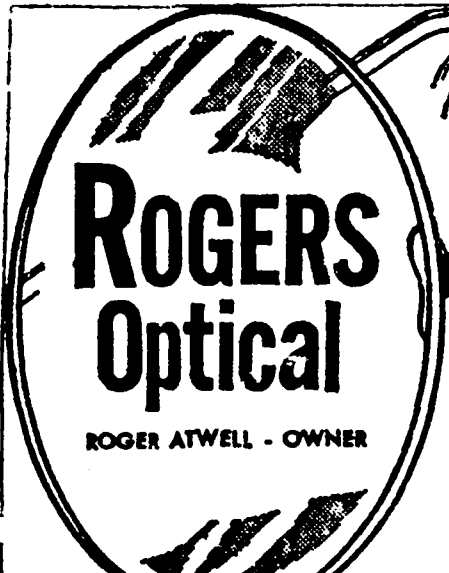

Wills, born in 1934, trained as a classicist and the author of seven books, announced at the end of his talk that he had plans for two more books: one that he really wants to write on Shakespeare, and one that he has no desire to write on politics. The latter he said, is publisher before he can get the first publication.

Sex ideas: which are true?

of sexual revolution. Namely, that young people -

- are engaging in premarital coitus in greater numbers
- are doing it more often
- are doing it with more different people
- are doing it more often with people they do not love

In fact, the research suggests (according to Kennedy) that changes in sexual attitudes are not in a more radical but in a more conservative direction.

"The sexual revolution has happened and it has not happened," Kennedy claims. "It has happened because people want to believe that it has, and it has not happened because the evidence does not suggest widespread radical changes in sexual behavior."

THE SEX IS EVERYTHING MYTH: Sex is extremely important, Kennedy says, but it has been so overemphasized in our day that a distortion has taken place. It is a part of man, not the whole. True sexuality is a function of the total personality and is experienced and expressed only in the lives of genuinely mature people. But the existence of the myth that "sex is everything" has force young persons, often prematurely, into sexual intimacy which they can neither appreciate nor explore in great depth.

"It is no accident," Kennedy maintains, "that many people seem fixated or frozen at the adolescent stage of development; The reason they look this way is because that is exactly where they are. It is also where they will remain as long as the myth about all-important sex shapes their understanding about themselves and their lives."

All too often, Kennedy says, when people invest themselves in the notion that sex is everything it turns out to be nothing at all. For Kennedy, the answer does not lie in more sex education courses; it involves the deepening of the entire course's appreciation of the real value and meaning of life itself.

THE "EQUALITY IN SEX" MYTH: There's a myth which states that men and women are not really different sexually and have fundamentally the same responses physiologically and psychologically. On the contrary, Kennedy says some of the biggest problems in the relationships of men and women (especially in the sexual sphere) arise from their difficulty in truly appreciating the genuine and ineradicable differences that exist between them on a physiological and psychological level.

As Kennedy puts it, this myth not only ignores basic differences between men and women but also "eclipses an appreciation of what makes their relationship rich and rewarding: the contrasts and complementarity of the sexes."

"It is hardly old-fashioned," says Kennedy, "to suggest that sex works best when an authentic man meets an authentic woman and they are able to share their identity in the intimacy that understands their equality while it acknowledges and respects their differences."

SOME "FREE AT LAST" MYTHS: Kennedy jabs at myths which flow from the new-found discovery of sexual liberation by today's society. One such myth is that group sex provides a valid answer to monotonous and confining one-to-one sex relationships.

"One cannot escape," he says, "the impression of loneliness and alienation and the hollowness of failed intimacy in their own marriages in the lives of so many who commit themselves to liberation through group-sexual experience. The very superficiality of the favored rationalizations tell us that something more must be understood about the isolated and puzzled people who are looking for religious salvation through swinging together."

Another "Free at Last" myth, Kennedy maintains, is the widespread and mostly unqualified endorsement of masturbation. The current myth is the logical overreaction to the very distorted views on masturbation that were held so strongly for so many centuries, he says.

"While it is clear that it is impossible to classify masturbation as a sin," he says, "it may not be quite so easy, nor so prudent, to glorify it in the way that has been done by many of these authorities."

Rev. Thomas McNally, C.S.C.

In Kennedy's view, masturbation is best understood in the whole complex process of human growth - it is part of the way in which a person deals with a transitional growing together of the sexual dimensions of his personality. But this does not mean that masturbation is a matter of indifference and just another leisure time activity. Not only can the fantasies which accompany it sometimes be signs of growth problems; but also masturbation itself can be quite isolating and is frequently used by the individual to combat depression.

"If a person grows to depend on masturbatory activities," Kennedy points out, "this may also impede his development in relationships to other persons. If he finds the focus of all pleasure in himself, then he cannot pass through the further stage of being able to share himself which is essential to human growth."

ND ticket exchange reaches goal of 760

by Jim Eder
Staff Reporter

Seven hundred-sixty underprivileged children from the South Bend area will be able to see their first live football game Saturday, thanks to the generosity of those Notre Dame and St. Mary's students who donated their Missouri tickets to the Student Ticket-Exchange Program.

As of Wednesday night the program was about fifty tickets short of the number it had promised to deliver for the youths, but enough students contributed their passes yesterday afternoon to meet the goal. Due to the initial lack of student response the deadline for contributions, originally set for Tuesday, was extended two more days.

"The whole thing is really sponsored by the student body," explained program coordinator B.J. Bingle, when asked who was responsible for the project.

"Besides those students who donated their tickets, sixty volunteered to act as monitors at the game and another thirty offered to drive the kids from South Bend to the stadium."

Bingle also praised Kathy Kane, a senior from St. Mary's who heads the Neighborhood Study Help Program. "She was a great help in organizing and running the project." The student government provided the program with funds for advertising the campaign.

The children who will be attending Saturday's game come from eight community youth groups. The largest participants in the project are the Neighborhood Study Help Program and the Logan Center for mentally retarded children. Other groups sending children to the game are the Northeast Neighborhood Center, the Sister Marita Day School, Big Brothers, Big Sisters, Manasa and CILA.

. . . on long and the scum of the earth

a Kersten roomie

Editor:

re: Tom Long's column

Kersten never intended to answer your remarks in the October 4, Observer, and heretofore remains adamant on this point, calling them "too laughable for a reply," with oral or written. Since I roomed with him freshman year, however, I have decided to answer your behind-the-scenes invective. After all, we're all "Friends," right?

It's strange that you so condescendingly remember Kersten as "That crazy freshman down the hall wearing a Beach Boys tee-shirt". I only recall you as that myopic--it was a Hobie Surfboards tee-shirt, Tom--Palitico up the hall who continually stopped by the room around election time trying to tell us who to vote for, not to mention the time you self-righteously threatened to bring Kersten up before the Hall Judicial Board for playing soccer in the hallway. "This isn't a personal attack," but in view of your past relationship with Kersten, you have scant grounds for terming yourself his friend. In fact, I don't think anyone in our section would have called you his friend.

I trust most discerning readers saw through the petty sourgrapes tactics in your warmed-over version of True Confessions; nevertheless, there are some blatant lies in it that need correction. For one thing, Kersten was at his best cursorily acquainted with many of the winners of friends receiving their appointments from each other and in no way representative of the students, use it for their own personal ends. According to Kersten, the only way they could have validly endorsed anyone would have been to publish the transcript of those oh-so-revealing interviews which allowed them to decide who would be best for the students. The Observer being, to quote you, Tom, "The one media which can reach the students," they should at least be required to allot free space before the elections for opposing viewpoints, a practice required of the nation's privately owned television networks--and there are three, not just one, of them.

Your astounding implication that Kersten sits up each night to run the student's $80,000 through his fingers is also a blatant falsehood. You are well aware, or should be, given your apparent inside contacts in Student Government, that the Student Government fund is to be apportioned by the Board of Commissioners, i.e., the students on the SLC, and not by the SBP himself.

You demand that Kersten admit he doesn't give a damn. Who ever said he did? Kersten? The students? No, Tom, just you wake up, "buddy". I was also amused to read how you attempted to identify yourself with Kersten's devil-may-care attitude toward student politics in statements like "You and I have both said forget the whole thing." You pretend to abhor poobahs, but "What would the students think if they knew" you were an integral part of that very "clique of poobahs." Why don't you admit, friend, that you played lackey (after your own unsuccessful elective attempts) as Hall Captain for both John Barket--the 1971-72 premier poobah by subjective consensus--and again for Bob Higgins in his unsuccessful bid for SBP last Spring--not to imply that there might be any hard feelings between you and R. Calhoun. Finally, Thomas, admit that you told Kersten last Spring that when he resigned, you yourself planned to run for SBP. That alone was enough to keep Kersten, indeed, any sane man, in office.

Oh, yes, Kersten's on an ego trip. In light of your own voiced aspirations toward SBP, I bet it really gets you, doesn't it?

All in all, your column came across as a mixture of half-baked truths and frustrated ambitions. Really, Tom, both Kersten and I pick our friends more carefully than that.

no entertainment

Editor:

I am writing to express my disappointment and disgust at the supposed "entertainment" before the arrival of Senator Kennedy last Friday. To disapprove of the Republican administration is one thing but to express such disapproval through suggestive lyrics and lewd grunts is another. As a member of the ND-SMC, Student BODY I resent the implication that this community fosters such air plays of immaturity and extreme poor taste. In short, I found the attitude and performance of the Scum of the Earth offensive. The group owes all of us who were assembled at Stepan Center an apology.

Sincerely,

Notre Dame looks for 5th straight

by Vic Dorr

Missouri's Tigers will be stalking a major upset when they enter Notre Dame Stadium tomorrow afternoon, but the host Irish are likely to welcome their visitors with open arms.

The Irish haven't been lulled by Missouri's 2-3 record, or by the Tiger's most recent loss—a 62-0 shellacking by Nebraska—but they will be savoring their reprieve from the practice field, where injuries during the past week have taken a heavy toll. Defensive tackle Steve Niehaus has been lost for the season with a knee tear, and a pair of speedy offensive performers have been side-lined with shoulder maladies.

Wide receiver Bob Washington suffered a shoulder separation and won't see action for the next several weeks. Running back Eric Penick also has an injured shoulder, and while he has been practicing in pads the past two days, he is doubtful for Saturday's game with Missouri.

But Coach Al Onofrio's Tigers, despite their lackluster record, figure to be Notre Dame's biggest concern of all come Saturday. Missouri has beaten Oregon (24-22) and California (34-27), and has lost to Nebraska, Baylor (27-0), and Oklahoma State (17-16). But the Irish coaching staff still has a good deal of respect for their Big-8 visitors.

"Missouri has some very capable offensive people," said Irish scout John Murphy, "but they made crucial mistakes against Nebraska and they were turned into instant touchdowns."

Nor is the concern all Murphy's. "We have the same situation as a week ago," complained ND head coach Ara Parseghian, "and it's difficult for a coach to convince his team that games are won on the field and not before-hand. The Pitt game was a perfect example of this, and I'm sure Missouri will be the same case."

The team the Tigers will field tomorrow has not been without its own injury problems. Three of the top four runners in Mizzou's wish-bone offense were injured two weeks ago against Oklahoma State, and two of them are still doubtful for tomorrow's contest. Fullback Ray Bybee, the team's leading rusher (281 yards, 6.1 average) did not play last week, and neither did halfback Bill Zeigler. But quarterback John Cherry is healthy, and he has adequate back-up runners in juniors Tom Reamon (5-10, 190)

Niehaus lost for season

The bad news about Steve Niehaus is now official.

Notre Dame's standout freshman defensive tackle had surgery Thursday for torn ligaments in his left knee and will be out the remainder of the season.

Niehaus injured the knee Wednesday in practice during a pass rush drill.

and Leroy Moss (5-9, 193).

The Missouri passing game has lacked the punch of past years (the Tigers have thrown for only 381 yards in their five games), but Cherry does have a good target in tight end John Kelsey (6-6, 228). Little Jack Bastable (5-11, 195) fills the wide receiver position.

The Tiger defensive lineup is a blend of much youth and little experience. Missouri plays a 5-3-3 alignment, and only three of the starters, tackle Dan McDonough (6-1, 217), end J.L. Hoak (6-2, 210), and linebacker Tom Kellett (6-0, 195) are seniors. The deep defense is manned by three juniors, and sophomores fill the rest of the defensive slots.

The season has been less-than-rewarding for the Tigers and their second-year coach. Three cliff-hanging ball games have come side-by-side with a pair of laughs, and things don't figure to get much better this week.

"Notre Dame has a very good team," said Onofrio. "They're bigger defensively than the teams we've been meeting, and they play their defense aggressively. Offensively they use a lot of multiple formations, and have a quarterback who reminds you a little of Joe Theismann. He may not be quite as quick, but the resemblance is there."

Tom Clements, the quarterback who has so impressed Onofrio, and the rest of his teammates will be trying to rebound Saturday from a "down" game against Pitt. The Irish offense sputtered for nearly two-and-a-half periods against the Panthers before Drew Mahalic's interception return broke the game open.

"Mahalic's interception was

Eric Penick, limited to only 40 yards in 13 carries by Pittsburgh, has been bothered by a shoulder injury this week and may not be in top form for Saturday's game with Missouri.

obviously the key play," said Parseghian, "and our kids came up with the big play several times. But I was disappointed with our first half turnovers. We lost three fumbles, we had a kick partially blocked, we had penalties. We made as many mistakes in the first 30 minutes against Pitt as we had made in the first three games of the season."

But the Irish overcame their mistakes against Pittsburgh and went on to win impressively. Tomorrow, against Missouri, they should be just as successful.

The Irish Eye

Football picks

Injuries, unfortunately, play a major role in sports, especially in football, where they occur so frequently. In order to have a successful season, a football team invariably has to overcome some injuries to key personnel.

Notre Dame's squad suffered its first major setback in the injury department this week with the loss of freshman tackle Steve Niehaus for the remainder of the season. Although only a first year player, Niehaus had started every game this fall and had done an outstanding job. But now he's gone, and the Irish will have to replace him. It won't be easy, but it's part of the game.

The Irish are hurting for this weekend's game with Missouri. Besides Niehaus, wide receivers Willie Townsend and Bobby Washington and halfback Eric Penick aren't in top shape, although Penick was practicing in pads Thursday afternoon. Mizzou won't have any sympathy for the Irish however, particularly since the Tigers were missing star halfback Joe Moore when the teams first met two years ago.

Despite last week's 62-0 drubbing at the hands of Nebraska, the Tigers figure to give the limping Irish a tussle, at least for awhile. The N.D.-Mizzou game is far from the top contest of this week's collegiate slate, though.

With games like Oklahoma-Colorado, Auburn-Georgia Tech, Texas-Arkansas, and Tennessee-Alabama, there figures to be plenty of action across the country this weekend. And here's the way the Irish Eye figures the action to turn out:

Notre Dame over Missouri — The Irish were almost caught looking past Pitt last weekend. They won't make the same mistake tomorrow. Watch for the N.D. offense, which has had two "off" games of late, to return to its early (and devastating) form.

Air Force Academy over Navy — The Falcons can prove their claim of being the best service academy football team.

Purdue over Northwestern — The Boilermakers are starting to play the way they should have all season.

Ohio State over Indiana — Indiana has its best team since the "Cinderella squad" of '67 but the Hoosiers are no match for Woody Hayes' Buckeyes.

Texas over Arkansas — Longhorn pride was hurt last Saturday when Oklahoma dealt Texas its first shutout since 1963. This weekend, the Razorbacks will pay the price.

Boston College over Pittsburgh — The Eagles made Air Force scramble for a win last Saturday in Beantown.

Oklahoma over Colorado — The Sooners are the choice in this confrontation of Big Eight powers.

Southern Cal over Washington — The Huskies' bark is worse than their bite.

Penn State over Syracuse — The Orangemen will be black and blue after this ball game.

Texas Christian over Texas A & M — The Horned Frogs loom the favorites but they'd better not be caught looking ahead to next week's game with the Fighting Irish.

Auburn over Georgia Tech — The Tigers took it on the chin in last week's showdown with L.S.U. but they'll be back and battling against the Yellowjackets.

Houston over Miami (Fla.) — The Hurricanes won't get five downs to beat Houston like they did last week versus Tulane.

Michigan over Illinois — This won't be the week the Illini win a game.

Nebraska over Kansas — Another Big Eight laughter for the Corn-huskers.

Upset of The Week:

Tennessee over Alabama — The Volunteers are going "Bear hunting" this Saturday in Knoxville.

Last weekend: 11 of 15 — .733 Season's Pct. 68 of 90 — .756

OBSERVER SPORTS

Irish jayvees at Mich. St.

Notre Dame's junior varsity football team will play its second game of the season Friday in East Lansing against Michigan State.

Kickoff time in Spartan Stadium is 1:00p.m. (E.S.T.).

The Irish JV's coached by Dennis Murphy, enter the game with a 1-0 record following a 17-7 success at Michigan three weeks ago. Michigan State is 0-3 after setbacks to Michigan, Northwestern and Ohio State.

Freshman Art Best and sophomore Ron Goodman, both halfbacks, anchored the opening victory with 83 and 82 yards rushing respectively.

Following Friday's game, the Irish face Michigan and Michigan State at home on October 27 and November 3 respectively and then close the season at Tennessee on November 11.

The game with Michigan on October 27 will start at 12 noon on Cartier Field's new artificial field.

Art Best's 56-yard touchdown run was one of the highlights in last Saturday's 42-16 victory over Pittsburgh. A freshman, Best runs the 100 in 9.7 seconds.

Bertelli to speak at Mizzou rally

Tonight's Stepan Center pep rally will feature former Irish great Angelo Bertelli, quarterback for Coach Frank Leahy's teams in 1942-43 and was the first Irish player ever to win the Heisman Trophy, which he did in 1943.

Bertelli will talk at the pre-Missouri pep rally at 7 pm. With him on stage will be current Irish halfback Darryll Dewan, linebacker Jim Musuraca, and Coach George Kelly.

Irish harriers meet Indiana

Notre Dame's cross country team faces a stiff assignment Friday against Big Ten power Indiana in Bloomington.

Irish finished 8th in their own invitational last Friday while the Hoosiers split with Miami and Illinois. Indiana lost to Miami 23-33 but tripped Illinois 17-46.
