Montanaro found guilty of plagiarizing research paper

By MARK PANKOWSKI

An academic honesty committee found Student Body Vice President Don Montanaro guilty last week of plagiarizing a major research paper, sources told The Observer.

Montanaro was ordered to rewrite the paper on a different topic or flunk the fall-semester course, said a source, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

Two other Notre Dame students, who were working with Montanaro on the group project, were also found guilty of plagiarizing, the source said.

Montanaro would not discuss details about the committee proceedings. He did say, however, "I can tell you what is involved in this situation is poor organization, carelessness and ignorance of the rule of footnoting."

"What has come out of this is that we have to produce a new paper."

One of the students this week confirmed the three appeared before an academic honesty committee on Wednesday. He declined further comment, saying the committee's proceedings are confidential.

Speaking Tuesday night, Montanaro said the incident "in no way affects my ability to do my duty as student body vice president."

Student Academic Commissioner Doug Wurth, however, said he thinks Montanaro should resign.

"I think anyone should resign their position of leadership if they've been shown to violate or ignore the University regulations," Wurth said. "Basically, it's a violation of the community."

Student Body President Mike Switek was not at home Tuesday night and could not be reached for comment.

Montanaro and the students were caught plagiarizing late last semester in a class entitled "American Voting and Elections," the source said.

The 400-level government course was taught by Professor David Leege, who acknowledged that an incident of plagiarism occurred in his class last semester.

"I have indicated publicly that there was a charge of plagiarism in my class and that the charge was sent to the department's honesty committee," said Leege, who declined further comment.

The source said Montanaro plagiarized by copying from publications and not documenting where the information came from.

Montanaro and the students' punishment entails that they must get the equivalent of a "B" on the paper they are to rewrite, the source said. No matter what grade they normally would receive on the paper, however, they still will get a failing grade on it.

The failing grade will then be averaged in with their midterm and final exam grades, the only other marks they received in the course, the source said. If they fail to do the paper, they fail the course.

Notre Dame's student handbook du Lac states that a student committing an academic offense, if serious enough, could face "penalties up to dismissal from the University."

The penalty's severity also depends on whether the student has committed a previous offense, du Lac states.

Students found guilty of academic offenses have the option of appealing the committee's decision to the dean of the college. Montanaro and the two students are apparently not appealing.

A few years ago, Wurth said, the administration asked a student leader to resign because the leader charged personal phone calls to a student government credit card. Wurth added, however, that he doubted the administration would ask for Montanaro's resignation.

Montanaro said the administration has taken no stand on the plagiarism incident.

"This is a college matter," he said.

Student leaders renew alcohol awareness with zeal

Editor's Note: these articles mark the first part of a three-day series that examines the issues and incidents of drunk driving in the Notre Dame and Saint Mary's communities.

Student leaders agree that last semester's unfortunate alcohol-related accidents probably will do more to deter students from drinking and driving than any awareness programs can ever do.

"For most of us, it's like a brick over the head. You can't hit more close to home than that," said Jeanne Heller, Saint Mary's student body president.

But with the death of Zahm Hall junior Michael Cogswell as a constant reminder, Heller and other leaders are renewing alcohol awareness efforts with extra zeal on both campuses.

For Vince Willis, vice president of the Notre Dame chapter of BACCHUS, a national group which promotes responsible drinking, it's a chance to gain more active support for his group's ideas.

"Since the accidents, everyone has been more willing to talk about the alcohol problem on campus," Willis said. "The whole University has been very supportive of BACCHUS," he said.

Willis, who also manages Theodore's, said more than 300 schools belong to BACCHUS nationwide. Notre Dame is one of the newest members, officially joining earlier this year.

At the group's annual meetings, he and representatives from other campuses discuss ideas, events and problems which occur in dealing with the national crisis of alcohol and drug addiction, Willis said.

Willis then returns to Notre Dame and Saint Mary's, where programs such as next week's alcohol awareness program turn from ideas into reality.

"There's no easy solution to the problem of drunk driving," Willis said. "You obviously can't just tell people they can't drink."

Willis said BACCHUS' goals are realistic, because they are based on the premise that students always will drink alcohol.

"We're acknowledging that alcohol is part of the social life here," he said. "We're saying it's not bad to drink, if drinking is done responsibly."

Specifically, the group plans to promote alcohol education inside and outside the Notre Dame classroom, similar to classes and Driver: How could I do something like that?

A car returning home from an off-campus party strikes a pedestrian early one Saturday morning on South Bend Avenue not far from two popular student bars.

The driver pulls over and walks over to the scene. Slowly a small crowd forms.

Police cars converge on the scene and immediate attention is paid to the injured victim.

The driver, a Notre Dame student, is charged with driving under the influence of alcohol and taken to the county jail.

The victim, also a Notre Dame student, is taken to St. Joseph's Hospital. Uncon-cious, he suffered a one-hour lapse of memory, facial cuts and bruises, and broken upper and lower jaws.

Just knowing that I could do something like that. That's what I kept thinking -- how could I do something like that?"

The county prosecutor's office classified her crime as a Class C misdemeanor. She was 19 at the time of the Sept. 27 accident.

She said she remembers exactly what the judge said to her on her final court date Dec. 9. "He said, 'I don't know what it is about you ND students. You cannot drink and get behind the wheel of a car.'"

The victim in the accident was Craig Gundersen, a Grace Hall freshman. Gundersen, whose mouth was wired shut for the six weeks after the accident, will have braces put on this summer to correct his teeth.

For the most part, however,

In Brief

Notre Dame Security has received 33 larceny reports of items taken from south dining hall since Aug. 26, said Assistant Director of Security Phil Johnson. Six of the reports involved stolen clothing, the rest involved books or book bags, he said. The total value of the items taken was about $3,000. Johnson asked that anyone noticing any suspicious activity at South Dining Hall or having information about the thefts contact Security at 239-5555. -The Observer

Fired friend not perfect but will be missed by at least one

A friend of mine told me last night that he was no longer employed.

He did not quit, even though he knew that continuing to work in the position he held jeopardized his future with the business. To him, quitting was something he could not even consider; it meant giving up, and he would never give up on a commitment he had undertaken.

And so he continued to work, hoping things between him and the management would somehow get better. But they didn't, and yesterday my friend called to say he had been fired.

Anyone who has ever experienced a firing knows how devastating it can be. It is not just the loss of a paycheck and the security a salary brings; this was not a problem for my friend, who has already obtained other employment.

Being fired is more a loss of an identity; you are no longer part of an organization by which you defined yourself. You no longer have a place where you are needed for your own personal abilities, and that can leave you feeling adrift and more than a little like a failure.

In the case of my friend, anyone who ever worked with or under him knows this is simply not true. Vince Lombardi once said, "If you're lucky enough find a guy with a lot of head and a lot of heart, he's never going to come off the field second." Judged by these standards, my friend lost nothing more than his position, because no one put more of himself into everything he undertook than he did.

Sometimes that got him into trouble; it was probably the characteristic which got him fired. Because he had such enthusiasm for the work he did, and because he set such high standards for himself, he often demanded more from his colleagues and employees than it seemed he had a right to. His own confidence that he would succeed in anything he attempted might have been considered cockiness, and was often a source of friction between him and others. But it was also an infectious quality that imbued his staff with the same assurance.

I remember the time he told me about a project that had to be completed in a four-hour deadline, a project that was so involved and important that most people thought it could not be done within such stringent time limits. Not only did his staff finish the job in the record time he had set, but they produced some of their best work. And I know my friend was there from beginning to end, doing as much as everyone else and giving them the confidence to succeed.

I also remember the times he called and told me about mechanical problems in his office, problems which he often worked late into the night to correct. There was no recognition in these hours of overtime work and little reward other than the personal satisfaction which comes from a job well done. But that was enough for my friend, and it kept him going when most people would have given up.

Mary Heilmann

Assistant News Editor

I don't mean to make this man sound like the perfect worker, or some kind of hero for managing to get fired from his job. I know he might have been difficult to work with, and I can only imagine what it would have been like to be his boss. I suppose I'll never know all the reasons why he was relieved of his duties; that is something between him and his boss, and I don't pretend to know the answers.

I do know that he'll be missed by those he worked with. And if you're wondering why I'm writing this article, telling you about a friend of mine who lost his job just like thousands of other people in thousands of other offices all over the country, I guess that's the reason. I guess I hope he'll get a chance to read this, and that he'll know he will be missed.

It's official at last: Hiler wins

Associated Press

WARSAW, Ind. -Rep. John Hiler, R-Ind., won the recount of the nation's closest congressional race Tuesday by 47 votes and returned to Washington to resume work in the 100th Congress.

The final tally presented to the State Recount Commission showed Hiler with 75,979 votes and Democratic challenger Thomas Ward with 75,932 votes.

Hiler won the Nov. 4 election by 66 votes. Ward's staff conceded defeat after fighting the original tally for more than two months.

"It's over. It took 77 days, but the original (election) certificate is reaffirmed," Hiler said.

Secretary of State Evan Bayh the chairman of the bipartisan recount commission, said the three-member panel will hold a formal vote Friday to confirm Hiler's victory.

"It's pro forma. Nothing's going to change," he said.

Ward's campaign manager,

Mike Marshall, said Ward would hold a news conference Wednesday to discuss his future. Marshall refused to say whether Ward would run again for Congress in 1988.

James Masters, Ward's attorney during the recount, said he had advised Ward not to challenge the outcome in court. An appeal would leave district voters in doubt about their representation in Congress, he said. "(Ward) does not want to be party to that sort of thing," he said.

he has recovered from the accident.

The driver of the car that hit him said her immediate thoughts after the accident were of the victim. "Everyone was so supportive of me. I was concerned more about Craig than anything.

"Craig was punished for something I did."

She read The Observer's articles on the two other incidents that occurred last semester involving drunk driving.

"But I could understand how much it hurt (the drivers)."

Her rector, Sister Jo Screes, believes the students who were charged for drunk driving in last semester's incidents can have a strong effect on the students in the Notre Dame and Saint Mary's community. Their experience, she said, "can be a powerful witness."

"They can say, 'This is the law. And this is what happened to me,'" Screes added. "They can raise consciousness on this issue."

The driver of the car that hit Gundersen said the incident has made her more aware of the problem of drunk driving. "Oh, yes," she said. "I have become more aware."

She said she feels students do not realize what a responsibility it is they face when they step behind the wheel after a few drinks. "I honestly don't think students think about what's happened to other people."

Gundersen claims the experience has increased his own awareness about drunk driving. He described the mentality towards drunk driving of his friends back home in Wisconsin as very lax.

"Because of the three accidents that occurred at Notre Dame last year, I think the students here have greater awareness," he said.

Greater general awareness is something the driver of the car thinks could help end the

Students get obscene calls

By MARK PANKOWSKI
News Editor

Since Christmas Break, six Notre Dame students have received obscene phone calls from a man claiming to be holding their parents hostage.

Notre Dame Security Detective Anne Schellinger said the caller phones female students and threatens to kill their parents unless the students do what he tells them.

The caller, believed to be at least 30 years old, uses "very vile language" and "talks with authority in a monotone voice," Schellinger said.

"The calls are extremely obscene in nature," she said.

Schellinger said the calls are especially worrisome for students because they're unable to call their parents while talking to the man.

have no way of knowing whether or not the caller is actually holding their parents hostage, Schellinger said. "A person could have a nervous breakdown," she said.

Schellinger recommended that students hang up immediately upon receiving a call from the man.

Of the six calls, Schellinger said three were reported Tuesday. She said she did not know whether Saint Mary's students had received any of the calls.

Schellinger, however, said the caller may be the same man who phoned Saint Mary's students about five months ago claiming to be conducting a National Educational Association survey.

Schellinger asked that anyone receiving one of the calls or having information about the caller contact Security at 239-5555.

she will be required to give five lectures on her experience. She said her message will be "It happened, you make mistakes, you don't let it happen again.

Time to take action for HPC Leaders

By CINDY RAUCKHORST
Senior Staff Reporter

The Hall Presidents' Council last night formed a special committee to discuss solutions to alcohol-related campus problems.

"We don't have any definite answers, but if we talk about it, maybe we can identify some of the possible solutions," said HPC Co-chairman Joanie Cahill. "It's time for us to take some kind of action," she said.

"We're at the point in society today where many of the most crucial problems can be directly or indirectly related to alcohol," said Vince Willis, vice-president of the Notre Dame chapter of BACCHUS, who spoke at the meeting.

BACCHUS, a national organization which promotes the responsible use of alcohol, became officially recognized at the University earlier this year.

The council agreed to support the BACCHUS-sponsored alcohol awareness mini-week, "Friends Keep Friends Alive," which begins Monday. At last night's meeting, the Student Senate also agreed to support the program.

"Although the administration has been very helpful in the efforts to increase alcohol awareness on campus, we can't look to the administration to solve the problem," Willis said. "It has to start here with us."

Members of the newly-formed committee headed by Stanford Hall President Jim Wimbiscus said they probably will draft a letter stating the HPC's position on responsible drinking.

"Students have got to start realizing that getting drunk is not as cool as everyone thinks," said Bob Daley, Fisher Hall president.

Sorin Hall President Jim Fallon said the council should examine the effects of the three-year-old University alcohol policy, which he said is turning Notre Dame into a "commuter campus on weekends."

"Before the alcohol policy, I don't remember any of these things happening," Fallon, a senior, said, referring to last semester's three alcohol-related accidents.

"It seems to me the University could work to promote responsible on-campus drinking rather than driving everyone off," he said.

In other business, the council is drawing up a proposal to aid in the relocation of students from Howard, Carroll and Holy Cross halls. The presidents from these three dorms said they plan to meet later in the week, before Friday's deadline for Howard residents to indicate dorm preferences for next year.

The council voted to draft a letter to the administration voicing recommendations on the long-term plan to house a more balanced ratio of men and women at the University.

Council members also approved financial support for the Late Nite Olympics, sponsored by Non-Varsity Athletics, and for the Women's Care Center Phone-a-thon. The olympics are scheduled for February 13.

Cahill said the United Way Aerobathon of last semester raised almost $600.

workshops used at Saint Mary's.

According to Heller, the psychology class "Social and Problem Drinking" has met with success in the last two years, with a large waiting list each semester. The class is purposely limited to about 20 students, however, for more personalized instruction.

The College also sponsors alcohol awareness programs, such as the four-day program held last November.

"Each of the information sessions were packed during that week," Heller said. "So we know people are attending the programs."

"We try to provide alcohol education and social alternatives to drinking off-campus. But then it comes down to an individual response," Heller said. "We do what we can."

Heller said she and the class presidents plan to write a letter to Saint Mary's students encouraging them to participate in more non-alcoholic alternatives.

One such alternative, Willis said, is Theodore's, which in its first few months has attracted almost 1,000 students each weekend night.

"We've got to commend the administration on that. They stepped in on a big problem and did something about it," he said, referring to the need for an undergraduate alternative to hall parties at the onset of the alcohol policy.

"The alcohol policy is something we've learned to work with instead of fighting against. I'm not opposed, however, to reexamining the policy together as students and administrators," Willis said.

Some BACCHUS ideas require the cooperative effort of students and administrators. But others are geared toward students helping students, Willis said.

Two such efforts are peer counseling groups and programs to work with area high school students.

"Often attitudes toward alcohol are developed early on. We can make a difference especially with younger people," he said.

A program which has been effective with University students, Willis said, is the Buzz Bus sponsored by the Hall Presidents' Council and supported by both campus student governments.

According to HPC Co-chairman Joanie Cahill, the council plans to extend hours for the bus to now include Thursday as well as the weekend nights.

The bus, whose route includes stops at the Senior-Alumni Club, The Commons, Bridget McGuire's Filling Station and several off-campus locations, offers rides to students who don't want to drive or walk home after drinking.

Montanaro said for the last two weeks he has spoken to faculty and students about the problem of plagiarism.

"There is a general concern among faculty members that students are not aware of the proper ways to do research," he said.

"I've spoken to people close to me, fellow students, also ignorant as we were of these (research) techniques, and they did not see (the incident) as an infraction," said Montanaro.

"As a student leader my concern is that two second-semester seniors and a junior are still ignorant as to what would constitute plagiarism and footnoting," he said. "Many students are equally or worse knowledgeable of the subject."

Wednesday lunch fasts help world's hungry

Dear Editor:

When I got back from break there was a hand painted card addressed to the World Hunger Coalition in the mailbox with a simple message: "Many blessings for the new year." What this symbolized, though, ran much deeper than these words. The card was from a child halfway around the world. She had been given food and education by Caritas Bangladesh, one of the groups the Wednesday Lunch Fast supports.

The blessings this girl was giving would be incomprehensible to Western Hemisphere Catholics, but there was another message in the card. It was her life, her education, and her sacrifice. It showed the universality of kindness that runs deeper than cultural differences and distance.

This young girl, along with hundreds of others throughout the world, was helped by the sacrifice and generosity of those people in the Wednesday Lunch Fast. While this fast may appear to be a meaningless effort towards some unforeseeable end, it does make a substantial difference in the lives of many people.

This past semester 600 fasters raised $5,386 which will be distributed throughout the world. Our organization is presently re-evaluating where the actual money will be donated. In the past, the money went primarily to India. Due to the Green Revolution in that country and the growing needs in parts of Africa and Latin America, our giving patterns are gradually answering those needs.

Our thanks to all those who fasted this past semester. Please continue your generous and necessary support.

Peace must be sought in Iranian war region

Dear Editor:

Anyone who has read the article written by Brian Murray on Reagan's genius in foreign policy-making, and who has some knowledge on what is going on in the Middle East will find that many of the statements made have no ground and are misleading.

First, he states that "if Iraq wins, Russia will have an excuse to invade Iran to secure its borders." Murray has no explanation whatsoever as to why this is so. In any case Iraq has no intention of winning the war, that is, of invading Iran. In fact, Iraq has again and again offered to make peace with Iran. On the other hand, I do not see how Iraq, which is smaller in size and largely outnumbered in population by the Iranians, can invade and control Iran.

Secondly, Murray specifically states that "an Iranian loss could only destabilize the Mideast." On the contrary, if Iran wins the war against Iraq, it will destabilize the Persian Gulf states by encouraging the Moslem fanatics, who are growing in number, to control these states. A good example of the on-going activities of these groups is the coup d'etat that failed in Bahrain a few years ago and the attempt on the life of Emir of Kuwait.

As I see it, it would be in the interest of America to find a way to end the war between Iran and Iraq and to bring peace to the area. This certainly would not materialize by selling weapons to Iran. As a matter of fact, selling weapons would help Iran to continue its attempt to invade Iraq and at the same time encourage it to carry out more acts of terrorism. Only peace will secure the flow of oil to the world and end the suffering and bloodshed of the peoples of Iraq and Iran.

I suggest that those who attempt to analyze such a complicated subject have a better perspective of what is going on in that part of the world and a humanitarian drive for promoting peace rather than war.

Student responsibility should replace policy

The holidays have come and gone and a new year is upon us. For many it is a welcome opportunity to put the triumphs and hardships of the fall behind and begin anew. But in our eagerness to move on, there is one lesson which, more than any other, we should not efface from our memories. That is the frailty of human life.

Sean Garrett

guest column

Prior to the conclusion of the fall semester, drunk driving by Notre Dame students resulted in the deaths of a South Bend man and a Notre Dame junior. It would be an irreconcilable waste of life if we were not to learn from the error of our classmates, so again I bring this problem to your attention.

Whenever there is a death, there are many questions. Concerning the recent deaths associated with the Notre Dame family attributed to drunken driving, the most objective and commonly asked question is how do we, and society in general, tackle the problem of drunk driving. While it is wonderful the way the Notre Dame community rallies behind a cause generously offering a hand or advice, in this case, I fear we are missing the mark. The solution offered will merely mask our problem, failing to destroy its root. That is, we, as members of society, are failing to take responsibility for our actions.

As printed in the Observer, it is the feeling of many students that the existence of the alcohol policy is the cause of drunk driving. Although I question the motives behind the policy, that is of little relevance here. Drunk driving is a problem for all of society, not for just those of us at Notre Dame. To think that such a problem is restricted to those of us subject to the alcohol policy is naive to the point of being frightening. In turn, the solution to the problem of drunk driving should satisfy the needs of all of society. Sooner than we realize, we will be a part of the world which need not comply with du Lac. The removal of the alcohol policy, then, is not the solution to our problem. Policy or not, alcohol consumption will always take place on campus. The solution to the problem of drunk driving will be found only when we stop looking for excuses and hold ourselves accountable for our own actions.

Policing student parking lots and/or monitoring the gates at both campus entrances in an effort to discourage drunk driving or prevent drunk drivers from continuing on does not address the problem correctly. At that point one has already made the decision to drive while under the influence. Even if one is kept from reaching the roads, little will prevent him from trying again at a later date. No lesson has been learned. The driver has merely failed to beat the system. The effort to curtail drunk driving must be made before one reaches for his keys.

An increased presence of the clergy also fails as a solution to our problem. Responsible behavior resulting solely from the everpresent eyes of Big Brother benefits no one. Students should be encouraged to make responsible, educated decisions as part of a conscious learning experience, not out of fear of reprimand. Those of us who are students will soon be a more influential part of society and no longer hiding in the shadow of the dome. No longer will a lengthy document inform us of how and when we may consume alcohol. No longer will a hall staff be watching our every move and hounding us about our drinking habits. No longer will we find a gate at every street corner where we must prove our sobriety before passing through. Who then will monitor our every move?

This is the issue at hand. It is one of personal accountability. It is the only true answer to the question of drunk driving. Whether one is under the influence of alcohol or not, one is responsible for his own actions. If we do not hold ourselves accountable, if we do not choose to remain sober behind the wheel, we will continue to suffer the losses of loved ones.

As we enter the new year I ask you to give serious thought to the value of human life. As the future of society, I urge you to set an example for others. The decision to not drink and drive must be made before the drinking begins. I challenge you to take responsibility for your actions. Your life depends on it!

A Corps of hope

features writer

For most Notre Dame students, Christmas marked the completion of their first semester and the end of finals. To me it represented the six month mark of my two year commitment as a Peace Corps volunteer in Benin. Looking now at the changes that have occurred, it seems like I must have been here longer.

Less than a year has gone by since I first learned that I had been chosen to go to Benin. With one hand on the telephone receiver I told my placement director my excitement over the assignment and with the other I thumbed through an atlas to determine where this place was. Literature on Benin (formerly Dahomey) was scarce, and individuals who had actually visited there were even scarce, so it was hard to get an accurate picture of how I would be living for the next two years.

I arrived in early July with 11 other trainees for a project to promote fuel efficient, wood burning cook stoves. For the first three months, we were to spend eight hours a day, six days a week learning the skills necessary to function somewhat normally in our new jobs and culture. While the majority of this was in French language training, other important topics were covered as well: how to ride, maintain, and repair a Yamaha motocross bike, cultural do's and don'ts, how to kill, clean, and cook a chicken, the proper way to prepare a malaria slide, and of course, how to build a variety of stoves. During training we were also given one week to live with an active volunteer on site, and four weeks of living with a local family while commuting to the training site for classes.

By the time we were sworn in, we were one trainee lighter. Together we had chosen our own sites from a list of potential locations given to us by the government. On the average there would be two volunteers to each of Benin's six provinces. We were issued medical kits, motorcycles, and mosquito nets, taken out to our villages to be formally introduced, and left there.

Peace Corps has neither the time, resources, nor desire to ease anyone into their two years of service, but the volunteer is hardly on his own. I was only half finished sweeping out my new home when 20 local children gathered to inspect the work. By the time I was done, 15 more were called in for a second opinion. The people were friendly and patient, and extremely forgiving of a beginner's French. In two weeks something of a routine began to emerge.

Shortly thereafter many of the new volunteers underwent what could loosely be labeled as "culture shock." More accurately, it was the emergence of cultural evaluation, for there are elements of every culture that one finds desirable and not. When you begin your service you are often too fascinated with the new experience to make any type of judgement. For me this change occurred at 6:30 on a Sunday morning when my neighbor's son was beating on my front door to ask if I had any odd jobs for him. I did not appreciate it any more than I would have in the states. It is an important point when one can finally recognize the advantages and disadvantages of any cultural aspect, and then, assuming the good outweighs the bad, one will work out well.

It was not nearly as big of a hurdle as I had been led to believe. Many people find it more difficult to mentally recover from their first spill on their motorcycle than their first plate of fish head stew.

Most of the difficulties one experiences are best overcome with a sense of humor and an incredible amount of flexibility. There is certainly no way to obtain a type of security that comes from having a well-defined, predictable job here in the Peace Corps. One must foster a faith that somehow things will work out, and they do by avenues that you would least expect.

This is far and away Peace Corps' greatest asset: its ability to provide the volunteer with an endless supply of strange, unpredictable, and fascinating experiences. Additionally, I do not believe there are many jobs for the recent college graduate in which one can be so in control of one's own agenda. You can set your own goals and responsibilities far better than at any entry-level position with a stateside firm.

But there are sacrifices one must make to join Peace Corps. One must be willing to part with most of the American creature comforts. You must learn to deal with frustration and occasional boredom as things move much slower than most volunteers would like. And one must be able to put all home front personal relationships in their proper perspective; there is not a lot that can be done to ease the discomfort of two people who find it difficult to be thousands of miles apart. You are in this experience with both feet whether you like it or not.

The opportunity to experience a different culture from the ground level cannot be matched. For me I can see my views on Third World development changing as I experience not only different ways in which people live, but entirely new ways in which people think. I doubt I will ever look at anything with a completely American perspective again.

People are people (even in France)

One of my friends from home asked me in a recent letter if my host family was "typical" French. I laughed when I read that and smiled even wider when I read her next line, "What is 'typical' French anyway?" I have been trying to figure that out since I came here.

Mary Berger

C'est la Vie

Before I arrived, "typical" French to me was an old man sporting a beret with a cigarette hanging out of his mouth, riding a bike and carrying a loaf of bread and a bottle of wine. I have come to the conclusion that that image is very French.

There are other "typical" French characteristics.

Taking a three-hour lunch break for a long leisurely meal with one's family is one example. Most businesses are closed from noon to approximately 3:00 p.m. Restaurants are in business during these hours but then close until 7:00 p.m. rings in the dinner hour.

The patisseries-boulangeries one sees and smells everywhere are also an important part of most French people's days. In addition to picking up a fresh dessert or fresh bread, neighbors run into each other and chitchat.

"Typical" French students sometimes carry a heavy class load, frequent cafes, bars and discos during the week, and return home for the weekends. Very few students live in dormitories and little, if any, campus life exists. Students board with families or share apartments and find their excitement in town.

In spite of the differences from American life cited here, French people and the French way of life are not that different from Americans and our mode of living. The language may be different, the food may be different, and other superficial aspects of life may be different, but day-to-day living, growing and experiencing are the same.

People go to school and to work, they come home to their families and dirty dishes, they watch television and go to movies, they celebrate the birth of a new baby and they mourn the loss of any life.

Whether they live on one side of the Atlantic or the other, whether they are Catholic or atheistic, whether they have brown hair or blond, people are people. So let's hope it's not always like Depeche Mode puts it, "that we should get along so awfully."

Tired of the old routine?

After the victory, DiStanislao was hopeful that the big win would serve as a springboard for upcoming games.

"When you're 4-10 you take what you can get," said DiStanislao. "The team worked well rebounding tonight, and that is what we have to do to win."

The Irish next take to the court Saturday when they play on the road against St Joseph (Pa.).

Everybody has a realistic shot with Rozelle's ideal schedule. Someday, Rozelle will see his version of utopia: all NFL teams finishing at 8-8. He sure has done a great job in eliminating dynasties, hasn't he?

Humbly.

It's true that dynasties are a thing of the past, but it is not because of Rozelle. It is the nature of today's sports. There are a number of reasons for this inability to repeat. Some are easy to understand. Injuries and bad breaks are often at fault. Some others are more disturbing, and increasingly prominent, like drug problems, loss of motivation and salary bickering.

It is evident that with the makeup of today's sports, a team merely has to capture the ever-elusive spark that remarkably brings everything together for that team and carries it to the top of its sport in a given year. The catch is that once a team wins a championship, it is not allowed to have this magical spark the following year. That way no teams can hog this spark for too long, like the Boston Celtics and New York Yankees have been known to do in years past, and ruin the fun for the rest of the teams.

Coaching genius cannot overcome this system. Neither can an abundance of talent. Not even a great draft, or a cute quarterback can do it. It is inescapable.

This formula, not Rozelle, kept the Bears, who were nearing invincible status in the minds of most, from participating in this year's Super Bowl.

Rozelle's "equalizing" schedule somehow gave the Bears the easiest schedule in the league. Even though the Bears played barely above adequate for most of the year, the unending lineup of patsies they were presented kept their record from slipping too much. But the spark had left them, and no matter how much they tried to talk and intimidate to cover it up, they became just another team. What a shame.

That is what lies ahead for this year's winner also. Don't tell me the Giants are going to be a dynasty. They are just a nicer version of last year's Bears. Not quite as interesting, but much easier to tolerate. Don't tell me Denver, with John Elway, is the team of the future. We've gone through too many teams that never turn potential into production.

Next year, Denver's try for another dramatic drive to pull out a miraculous playoff victory will hit a snag. Next year, the Giants will not get great games out of Phil Simms at crucial times, and they will fall a notch or two. It may be not be much to look forward to, but these teams will face the same fate as the champs of the recent past. Duane Thomas' quote could be changed for the teams of the '80s to say "If these teams are so great, why are there different teams every year?"

Sorry Giants and Broncos, no matter how good you look this Sunday, don't expect to return to the big one. Endorse those products, write those books about your amazing life and renegotiate those contracts. Get all your fun in this summer because there is going to be a new king next year. Just ask the Bears.

Freshman center

Paddock is just what Irish needed

By RICK RIETBROCK
Sports Writer

There used to be an after-shave commercial in which a man would get a slap in his face and say, "Thanks, I needed that."

For Notre Dame freshman center Scott Paddock, Western Kentucky acted as the slap, and he believes he certainly did need that.

"The Western Kentucky game introduced me to what college basketball would be like," he says. "I think I've done pretty well since then."

Few could argue. Beginning with his two-point, three-rebound performance in the season opener, the 6-9 Paddock has averaged 2.5 points and 4.1 rebounds in 15.3 minutes of playing time. But his real progress has come on the defensive end.

"When I came here, the coaches told me to concentrate on rebounding and defense," he says. "I think I've improved in those areas, but I need to work on my offensive skills to be effective at this level."

At the high school level, Paddock was plenty effective. As a senior, he averaged 17.5 points and 14.4 rebounds per game, and participated in the Dapper Dan all-star game in Pittsburgh. But as always, the move to college basketball required some adjustments.

"At this level, everyone is just as big as I am," says Paddock. "That means I have to do the little things to be effective. I have to make contact, box out and go up and get the ball."

But Paddock has had a helping hand in making these adjustments. He and the other big men have the benefit of working with assistant coach John Shumate. Paddock says he has enjoyed that experience.

"It's incredible," says the Plantation, Fla., native. "He's been through it all, on and off the court. He knows the physical and the mental aspect of the game and he's been successful at the college and pro levels."

"We have a great coach-player relationship. He is so intense on the court, but he is very laid-back off it so that we can laugh and have a good time."

"It's really great to see how the things we work on in practice come into play during the games," Paddock continues. "It gives you a good feeling."

Never did things come together better for the big red-headed player than against Indiana. Paddock scored 10 points and seven rebounds in Notre Dame's near-miss at an upset.

"In that game, I came off the bench and everything just clicked," he says. "I felt really comfortable out there and had a lot of fun."

In recent weeks, Paddock has come off the bench as part of a group collectively known as the Blue team. Paddock says that the familiarity of the players in that group helps them in their performance.

"We practice together all the time so we really feel comfortable playing together," he says. "It gives a lot of us more of an opportunity to get playing time. We've had our positives and our negatives, but as long as Coach Phelps uses the Blue team we have to show we're ready to produce."

With the upcoming schedule promising to be among the toughest stretches all season, Paddock sees the importance of a few wins against the tough teams in getting an NCAA tournament berth, and his importance as a key to Notre Dame's chances to get that bid.

"It will be a challenge to make the NCAA Tournament, but it is something to work for," Paddock says. "The independents are strong this year, and only a few bids go out to independents so we have our work cut out for us."

"I think it's important for me to contribute to this team. If we have some success, I would like to feel a part of that success. It's easier at home, but DePaul was a real experience and the seniors have told me about Pauley Pavilion. I'm looking ahead with anticipation, not any nervousness."

What a difference a cold slap in the face early in a season can make.

Nebraska on Saturday is still uncertain. Both Durso's shoulder and Geneser's knee are being checked on a day-to-day basis.

With or without Durso and Geneser, the Irish will be facing their toughest competition in the next few weeks. Notre Dame, at 1-4 not including last night's exhibition meet, will host Nebraska on Saturday night and go to Purdue next Wednesday before hosting the National Catholic Invitational on Feb. 1.

ND women haul down 65 boards, muscle way past Cleveland State

By THERESA KELLY
Sports Writer

The Notre Dame women's basketball team dominated the boards last night, beating Cleveland State 85-68 to improve its record to 4-10 for the year.

The Irish used a large height advantage to outrebound the Vikings by a whopping 65-36 margin. Notre Dame's all-time record for rebounds in one game is 74.

"We knew we had the height advantage," said Irish head coach Mary DiStanislao, "and we had to go out and use it."

Junior forward Sandy Botham led the Irish with 15 rebounds, Annie Schwartz added 12 and Heidi Bunek pulled down 10. Bunek also led all Irish scorers with 22 points, shooting 10-of-16 from the field and two-of-three from the free-throw line.

"When Heidi decides to turn it on, she does really well," said DiStanislao. "She created baskets for herself on the fast breaks."

Last night's game also marked the first appearance of Notre Dame's two newest players to the team, Ellen Mauch, a 5-6 guard from Mineral Wells, Texas, and Kim Garrison, a 6-0 forward from Mill Creek, Wash. Both saw action last night, although neither scored.

Neither really had to score on a night when Notre Dame's tough defense forced Cleveland

State into shooting a woeful .189 (7-of-37) from the floor in the first half. The Irish led 41-27 at the intermission, and although Cleveland State's outside shooters improved their mark a little in the second half - scoring over the Irish zone to finish the game at a .278 clip - it was nowhere near enough.

While Notre Dame's traditionally-tough match-up zone defense was causing problems for the Vikings, the Irish offense was rolling to a .522 field-goal percentage for the game. Botham connected on 7-of-11 to chip in 15 points to the Irish cause, while guards Mary Gavin and Diondra Toney each added 11 points.

Irish wrestlers pin down win thanks to AIA forfeitures

By STEVE MEGARGEE
Sports Writer

After losing three dual meets this year because of matches it had to forfeit, the Notre Dame wrestling team finally got its chance to turn the tables last night against Athletes in Action.

Taking advantage of 12 points handed to Notre Dame by Athletes in Action forfeits, and overcoming some lackluster performances, the Irish defeated Athletes in Action, 25-23, at the ACC Pit.

Despite the win in the exhibition dual meet, Notre Dame head coach Fran McCann was not pleased with the results, as the Irish won only two of the six meets that were not forfeited.

"I was hoping to win four of six matches; we ended up losing four of six," said McCann. "We gave a couple of matches away that we could have won. I don't think we wrestled very well."

Notre Dame's two winners were 118-pound freshman Andy Radenbaugh, by a score of 11-1, and 142-pound sophomore Pat Boyd, by a score of 4-2 over Arizona State graduate Tom Riley.

"I was extremely pleased by Pat Boyd. He beat one of their better guys who was a good college wrestler," said McCann.

Injuries to sophomore standouts Jerry Durso and Chris Geneser may have partially affected Notre Dame's performance in the other matches, as some wrestlers had to change their weight classes to keep the Irish from forfeiting those matches.

"We had no continuity out there with the changed lineup, but I'm not going to make any excuses," said McCann. "If people are injured, the others are just going to have to suck it up and take up the slack. Some of the guys don't look hungry enough."

Whether Durso or Geneser will be able to wrestle against

Super Bowl's a BIG, but one-shot, deal

"If the Super Bowl is such a big deal, then why do they play it every year?"

Free-spirited running back Duane Thomas of the Dallas Cowboys uttered these words more than 10 years ago, obviously not agreeing with the rest of America that it should be held sacred. That was just one of the many phases that the Super Bowl has gone through in its previous 20 years.

Rick Rietbrock

Irish Items

The game began as a novelty, giving the wild and unpredictable AFL a chance to strut its stuff against the hallowed NFL. Tack on a few Roman numerals for authenticity and we may start a tradition here.

In the first two years, it was no match. The Green Bay Packers disposed of Kansas City and Oakland, and with them, all notions that the AFL was equal to the NFL.

But then some Joe from New York shook up the traditionalists with a promise and a performance that showed that this Super Bowl idea just may cut it after all.

Things went fine until Minnesota started making regular appearances. They managed to turn every game into a rout or a bore. They did more than just look bad, they managed to make some excellent Miami and Pittsburgh teams look bad with them.

When the Viking hex finally was eradicated, the Super Bowl put together some classics. The two Pittsburgh-Dallas matchups will forever be Super Bowl highlights. Who can forget Lynn Swann tipping and catching Terry Bradshaw's bomb out of the end zone? Or Jackie Smith dropping Roger Staubach's flip into it? These were the glory days of the Super Bowl.

But things have changed now, and it is not necessarily good or bad, just different. We still have the trans-afternoon pre-game shows that tell the viewer everything he wants to know about the teams in the game. Twice. We still have the best of each conference playing each other, the same general idea with which the game originated. Football has just fallen into the same cycle as both baseball and basketball. It is very hard to repeat as champion.

Not since the Steelers won in 1979 and 1980 has a team won consecutive Super Bowls. Most will say this is good. Pete Rozelle wanted parity and parity he is getting, right? Knock down those powerhouses and give the weak sisters a shot at the fame, the glory and the endorsements.
