The Sophomore Carousal.

Every once in a while one is forced to wonder whether the task of education should not be left to the police -- and in the case of the Sophomores, to the police-women (with apologies).

The Mark of Distinction.

The class of 1926 will be remembered as the class that put the monogram of the Blessed Virgin on a flask.

De Gustibus Non.

It all depends on the girl you bring. Some girls were insulted when their escorts drank and some when their escorts didn't.

Smartness.

"Always carry your liquor like a gentleman." This is smartness, the quintessence of education for the quintessent. For those who crave the quintessence of smartness, Cornwall, the scene of Saturday's movie, should command itself, for Cornishmen can carry a lot of liquor. Coal-mining is the chief occupation of Cornwall, coal-and tin-mining, under the sea. Those who crave a genuine capacity one of which any gentleman might be proud in any circle -- would do well to depart for Cornwall and mine coal under the sea. They owe it to themselves to go, because Notre Dame will only stunt their growth in the specialty they have picked out for themselves. South Bend is a hick town for liquor after you've seen Cornwall.

"Mether, Here's Your Son."

The last time Alabaster McDoodle visited Notre Dame he was picked by the sheriff. There is a new theory out about him in the meantime. It seems he showed up at a respectable dance with more than a cargo aboard. A few of his acquaintances finished the job out of their flasks -- unusual generosity for Alabaster.

Then Tiger LeBoeuf, Alabaster's dear old Walsh Hall pal, stood him up against the wall and crayoned across his broad expanse of laundry: "Father, here's your son."

They stood him up against the door, rang the bell, and let him deliver his message in person. Dad had never been a blacksmith, but you would have thought so if you had seen him deliver his answer in person.

Our Lady of Lourdes.

Devout clients of the Blessed Virgin will make reparation to her today by burning candles at the Grotto. Today is the feast of Our Lady of Lourdes. And they will pray for Sister Lourdes, who, after forty years of service in the kitchen, was severely scalded in an accident last Saturday morning.
